The committee had desired to avoid any further discussion on this question at the present time. It was understood by the members of the committee on both sides of the House that no further discussion would be had on this matter, so far as we were concerned (of course we could not speak for other gentlemen and did not desire to shut them off), until we could investigate these matters and make sure that if a specific sum is to be named it shall be sufficient to meet the necessities of the case. This is all I wish to say; I simply desired that the House should understand the question.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition whatever to debate any question as to the amount that should properly be appropriated for this purpose or to discuss the pension question at all. My object is to call attention to another question, to which I desire the attention of the Committee on Appropriations for a moment—a question underlying any question as to the propriety of these claims or the amount to be appropriated for them.

In looking at the Constitution of the United States we find it provided that—

No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time.

Just what provision is made for publication when appropriations, such as can be properly called appropriations, technically speaking, are made, so that Congress and the country may be advised of what is done by the Departments in the expenditure of such appropriations, I am not advised, for I am not, and never have been, a member of any committee having jurisdiction of the appropriations of the public money. But I want to invite the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to the language of this provision of our Constitution, that—

No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law.

Now, what is an "appropriation made by law?" Is it such an appropriation when we say that all of a certain class of claims which shall be audited by one of the Departments shall be paid out of any public money in the Treasury? Fairly construing the Constitution, I do not think that can be a proper construction of it. When I look at the word "appropriation," as defined by Webster—for he not only defines the general term, but gives us also the technical application or use of the word—I find this word defined as "the act of setting apart or assigning to a particular use or person, in exclusion of all others."

Now, the language of this bill, as I remember it, is that a sum of money sufficient to pay a certain class of claims is hereby appropriated. I do not know that I use the exact language; perhaps I employ a stronger expression than is used in the bill. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] has the bill before him, I shall be glad to have him quote the language of this particular clause.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. After describing the nature of the claims to be met, the language of the bill is this:

And for the payment of such amounts additional thereto as may be certified to be due by said accounting officers on this account during the fiscal year 1890, so much therefor as may be necessary is hereby appropriated.

Mr. ROGERS. So that we do not even use the word "sum." We set separate and apart for this given purpose no given sum. It is left discretionary, without designation, except when audited these claimants shall be paid. And the definition of the word "appropriation," as I have shown, is the "act of setting apart or assigning to a particular use or person, in exclusion of all others; application to a special use or purpose, as of a piece of ground, for a park, etc."

I will submit to my friend in all candor if we are to give this question the most latitudinarian consideration it is an unwise, impolitic, unsafe way to deal with public money. If we desire to conform to what I understand to be the uniform practice on that subject we ought to designate some sum. How much it may be is a matter on which I have no opinion, and upon which I desire to express none.

The legal definition is also given of "appropriation":

The application of the payment of a sum of money, by a debtor to his creditor, to one of the several debts which are due from the former to the latter.

So we find in the two definitions given one not legal, and the definition ordinarily given for "appropriation" involves the setting apart or separation of a certain sum of money from the balance of the money in the Treasury for the given purpose for which it is appropriated. And if we apply the technical definition it is a sum to be given for whatever is to be done. I suggest, if we wish to follow the letter or the spirit of the Constitution or desire to adopt the ordinary practical, business method which you apply not only to private but to public funds, equally so but perhaps stronger to public than to private funds, we ought to specify a sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary to do so; so our constituents, the country, the House, the Treasury of the United States may be advised what sum we have carved out of whatever funds are in the Treasury of a specific sum. If it is thought the sum you select is too large then let it be considered so much thereof as may be necessary, so appropriation bills shall carry to the country absolute verity as to the sum we appropriate.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I should like to be heard on this question, while I propose to delay the House but a moment. This was up before, and the House will remember the question involved. This is a class of claims coming to Congress from the auditing department at the beginning of each session, and I will read the existing law on the subject:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall at the commencement of each session of Congress report the amount due each claimant whose claim has been allowed in whole or in part to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Presiding Officer of the Senate, who shall lay the same before their respective Houses for consideration.

The provision of this bill as it left the House is a departure from the permanent rule, and provides for the payment of these claims as they may be audited by the Treasury Department, before they are sent to Congress for consideration. While the Committee on Appropriations was not disposed to raise any question, I desire to say now, as I have said before, as I said in committee, that I believe these appropriations ought to be specific.

These several items involve altogether $412,000 for the payment of such claims as may be audited between this time and the end of the fiscal year and paid without further consideration by Congress. I do not believe this is a wise measure, but the House has adopted it and the Senate has concurred in that idea and placed in the bill a specific sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to do this. The Treasury Department has said this is sufficient. The Senate, too, have given assent by saying they believe it is sufficient.

If we are to depart from the old plan of considering this matter in Congress and these claims are to be paid without consideration there ought to be a limit, and how can we do better than to take the figures of the Treasury Department after they are audited and sent for payment before Congress? Inasmuch as the question is up again, I believe the better policy would seem to be to close it out.

Mr. PETERS. You would close out the matter without investigation?

Mr. CLEMENTS. I would not.

Mr. PETERS. How would Congress ever consider the matter at all?

Mr. CLEMENTS. The Committee on Appropriations and the House and the Senate have given the entire amount which the Treasury Department asks and recommends as the sum requisite for the payment of these claims for the period specified.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I would like to close this debate if possible.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I do not wish to consume any further time.

Mr. DOCKERY. Before the gentleman from Georgia resumes his seat I would like to ask a single question. For some reason I failed this morning to get notice to attend the meeting of the Committee on Appropriations, and hence was not present when this matter was considered. The question I desired to ask is whether the specific amounts named by the Senate here are the amounts estimated by the Treasury Department as necessary to meet these payments.

Mr. CLEMENTS. They are the exact amounts asked for by the Treasury Department in the estimates.

Mr. DOCKERY. And the Senate proposes to give the exact estimates?

Mr. CLEMENTS. The entire amount.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I do not want to take up much more time with this matter if we can avoid it.

Mr. BLOUNT. Of course it is in the control of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. BLOUNT. Only five or six minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, the tendency of the times in this country and in all countries toward the improvement of the public service has been in the line of the most minute details of public expenditures as far as is practicable. You may recur to the early history of this country and these indefinite appropriations were common. But the experience of our public men has caused an enlargement in this direction in the matter of the specific designation of the items of appropriation and sums of money required to meet the expenditures of the Government. In Great Britain the detail of expenditures of appropriation is enlarged far beyond anything that obtains in this country. I think it need only be said that the specifying of the objects of expenditure and the amounts to be appropriated therefor are helpful to a careful scrutiny by legislative bodies in the preparation of necessary legislation on such subjects, and that it ought to be maintained in all cases wherever it is possible to do so.

An act of Congress directs a Secretary of the Treasury to send in his estimates to Congress—this amongst others—and for what purpose? Manifestly for the purpose of review and examination. And now, sir, we propose in haste to depart from the salutary policy indicated by that legislation of Congress, to depart from the policy indicated by the rules of this House in referring the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Committee on Appropriations for consideration and report thereon to the House, and it is proposed to let the Committee on Appropriations take entire charge of the subject, ignore the statute to which I have referred, ignore the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury absolutely, and declare that these are insufficient, and they propose to deal with the subject in the committee-room or in conference according to their own judgment. Sir, I believe in the necessity for conference committees, but I do not believe in transferring the powers and duties of this House in the matter of public expenditures blindly to a committee of conference or to any other committee.

The Senate has wisely, I think, taken the correct view of the matter by inserting in the appropriation bill the actual amount indicated by the Treasury Department as necessary. There is no indisposition to provide properly for it, but simply the desire to state distinctly and definitely what the sum shall be; and it comes back in that shape to the House—in the shape of a protest on the part of the Senate against this loose method of appropriating the public moneys. And in that shape it deserves the attention of the House. These sums should be concurred in by the House, if regarded as sufficient; and, if not, then the total should be reduced, and we should not refuse to exercise the powers belonging to the House of examining the matter by transmitting it blindly to a committee of conference.

Mr. MCADOO. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. MCADOO. I wish to ask the gentleman what, in his opinion, would be the effect of the House loosening its hold on the public purse by making indefinite appropriations.

Mr. BLOUNT. Naturally there is no such careful examination of the sums and items necessary, and naturally it follows that there would be careless consideration and hasty legislation.

Mr. MCADOO. The tendency would be to take from the House legislation on these subjects, in their consideration, and give it to the Department?

Mr. BLOUNT. That would be the tendency. And the only justification for this change is because it relates to matters connected with the pay of soldiers. If it related to anything else, the impropriety of this practice would not be questioned; but when it comes to an appropriation looking to the compensation of soldiers or the payment of any sums due them, a different rule prevails. Hitherto an appropriation of specific amount has obtained for this purpose and the necessary amounts have been appropriated to satisfy this expenditure. And the soldiers of the country are just as much interested in correct, methodical, and orderly legislation as any other part of the people of the country; and I trust that the feeling of gratitude and devotion to them will not induce us to depart from our salutary practices of legislation which we have hitherto regarded as important to protect the interests of the people.

I trust, therefore, that the House will concur in this Senate amendment, and not send back to the Senate a message that we are distrustful of the Secretary of the Treasury, that we are distrustful of your judgment in relation to these amounts, or that we intend to part with all power of review of these questions, and leave it entirely to the Department hereafter.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I now yield three minutes to my colleague on the committee [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky].

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, it was the understanding in the Committee on Appropriations that we should not have a debate now, but as the motion has been made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] it is perhaps proper that I should say that the view I have is more extreme than the motion of the gentleman from Indiana indicates.

There are three distinct propositions as to the provisions of the bill. One is the proposition of the gentleman in charge of the bill, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], and the chairman of the committee [Mr. CANNON], that there should be an indefinite and future appropriation out of which these claims should be paid without any limitation as to amount and without any power in Congress to revise the payments. The second is that contained in the Senate amendment, in which the gentleman from Indiana moves to concur, that there shall be this indefinite appropriation for claims to be hereafter audited, but that a limit shall be fixed to the amount to be thus used. The third is that which I approve, and it is indicated in the sixty-eighth amendment of the Senate, and that is that there shall be no further future indefinite permanent appropriations, where it strikes out the words:

And for the payment of such amounts additional thereto as may be certified to be due by said accounting officers on this account during the fiscal year 1900, so much therefor as may be necessary is hereby appropriated.

That is, I am opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa, even as modified by the gentleman from Indiana. I am opposed to giving to the accounting officers of the Treasury the power to pay any claims prior to their being examined and passed under the supervision and revisory power of Congress. No matter what that claim may be, that we ought to hold the final control over the expenditure of the public money. And while I think the proposition that the Senate has put in is a better one than the House adopted, I do not think it goes far enough. I am opposed to the whole principle of giving to the Executive Departments of the Government the power to spend money not previously appropriated by enumeration and distinct authorization by the Congress of the United States. I do not, therefore, want to seem to approve the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana except as being the lesser of two evils. I think that it is bad policy in the Congress of the United States to let go a single inch of the hold that it has over the purse-strings of the Treasury.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the general range of discussion, outside of what was offered by my friend from Arkansas, was fully gone over in the former debate, and I will not recur to those points further. My friend from Arkansas raises the question of definition of an appropriation, claiming that this kind of appropriation is in violation of the Constitution. I only want to say in reply that we have now indefinite appropriations amounting annually to about $106,000,000; that every Congress has interpreted the meaning of the word and acted upon it. Indefinite appropriations are made for many things. We make indefinite appropriations for paying the interest on the public debt and for the sinking fund. We make an indefinite appropriation in connection with the customs service, and about their fees, forfeitures, etc. And not only that, but in the case of paying the bonds and the sinking fund and interest there are permanent indefinite appropriations. So that we have some more offensive than this could possibly be. But more than that. The Congress of the United States has given the definition of the word "appropriation" in connection with this class of cases; for in the Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh Congresses we made indefinite appropriations for this very class of cases.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the previous question.

Mr. BLOUNT. Let us have a separate vote on these, Mr. Speaker. I hope we may have a separate vote on these amendments.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I would say to the gentleman from Georgia I do not think we need a separate vote on these amendments. We concurred in a number of amendments. These items are among the amendments we ask to non-concur in.

Mr. BLOUNT. On this proposition I ask a separate vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa demands the previous question upon the motion to concur in the amendments 60, 61, 62, and 63.

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not understand the motion was made to concur.

The SPEAKER. The motion to concur was made by the gentleman from Indiana. The first question is on ordering the previous question.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to ask that one of these paragraphs be read.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. They are of the same general class.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask that the first paragraph of the gentleman's amendment be read.

The SPEAKER. It has been read.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask that it be read again.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first put the motion for ordering the previous question.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the Chair decline to entertain the request?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first put the question on ordering the previous question.

Mr. BLOUNT. All right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed the wish of the gentleman from Georgia was being carried out.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 14, line 8, after the word "ninety," insert: "The sum of $200,000 for;" so that the amendment will read as follows:

"For the payment of such amount additional as may be certified to be due by said accounting officer on this account during the fiscal year 1890, the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated."

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I would like to have it taken altogether.

Mr. HOLMAN. They all involve the same question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendments numbered 60, 61, 62, and 63.

The question was put; and the Speaker announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Division.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 69, yeas 83.

Accordingly the House refused to concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report an amendment which the committee wish to have adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee recommend concurrence in amendment 55 with an amendment as follows:

Insert after the amended paragraph the following: "For plastering and finishing committee-rooms on the House side of the Capitol terrace, including steam heating of said rooms, $7,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The report of the committee was then agreed to, and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa, Mr. CANNON, and Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky.

DIGEST OF CLAIMS REFERRED TO THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Printing and ask for its present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 70) authorizing the printing of the digest of claims referred by Congress to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be printed copies of the digest of claims referred by Congress to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act, now in manuscript, prepared under resolution of the House of Representatives of March 7, 1888.

The Committee on Printing report the following concurrent resolution in lieu thereof:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 500 copies of the digest of claims referred by Congress to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act, now in manuscript, prepared under resolution of the House of Representatives on March 7, 1888, the same when printed to be placed in hands of the Clerk of the House for the use of the Senate and members of the House.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the joint resolution will be laid on the table and the question will be taken on the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was adopted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report of the committee accompanying the resolution be printed in the RECORD.

The report is as follows:

The committee have considered the joint resolution (No. 70) authorizing the printing of the digest referred by Congress to the Court of Claims for finding of facts under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act, and direct me to report the same back with recommendation that it do lie on the table, and that a substitute therefor be adopted in the form of a concurrent resolution which is herewith submitted. The concurrent resolution will accomplish the object desired, and there is no reason why a joint resolution should be passed. The estimated cost of printing 500 copies of this digest of claims is the sum of $1.184.

Mr. RICHARDSON also, from the Committee on Printing, reported back the following concurrent resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Public Printer be, and is hereby, authorized to print 2,500 extra copies of the annual report of the health officer of the District of Columbia, 100 for the use of the Senate, 500 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,050 for the use of the said health officer of the District.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. KNAPP, on account of sickness in his family.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had concurred in the resolution of the House providing for printing the report of the Zoological Park Commission.

The message also returned, in accordance with the request of the House of Representatives, the bill (H. R. 2239) for the relief of the heirs of John H. Jones and of the heirs of Thomas D. Harris.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 6099) granting an increase of pension to Elmer A. Snow.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. 525) to establish two additional land offices in the State of Montana.

The message also announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. 856) to amend section 1 and section 9 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the Denison and Washita Valley Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved July 1, 1886, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. JONES of Arkansas, Mr. DAWES, and Mr. STOCKBRIDGE as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 73) for the relief of Avery D. Babcock and wife, of Oregon;

A bill (S. 231) for the relief of Robert H. Montgomery;

A bill (S. 393) for the relief of Aquilla Jones, late postmaster at Indianapolis, Ind.;

A bill (S. 2389) granting an increase of pension to Robert H. Milroy, major-general, United States Volunteers;
 A bill (S. 2451) granting a pension to Juliet Opie H. Ayers;
 A bill (S. 2531) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin T. Baker;
 A bill (S. 2598) increasing the pension of Walter P. Harrison; and A bill (S. 2611) granting a pension to James Anderson.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 4, being an act authorizing the establishing of a public park in the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC PARK IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. BURBOWS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4) authorizing the establishing of a public park in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

An act (S. 4) authorizing the establishing of a public park in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a tract of land lying on both sides of Rock Creek, beginning at Klinge Ford Bridge and running northwardly, following the course of said creek, of a width not less at any point than 400 feet, including the bed of the creek, of which not less than 50 feet shall be on either side of said creek, or more than for 500 feet on either side of said creek south of Broad Branch road and Blagden Mill road, and of such greater width north of said roads as the commissioners designated in this act may select, shall be secured, as hereinafter set out, and is perpetually dedicated and set apart as a public park or pleasure ground for the benefit and enjoyment of the people of the United States: Provided, however, That the whole tract so to be selected and condemned under the provisions of this act shall not exceed 2,000 acres.

Sec. 2. That the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, the president of the board of commissioners of the District of Columbia, and the engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, appointed a commission to select the land for said park, of the quantity and within the limits aforesaid, and to have the same surveyed by the assistant to the said engineer commissioner in charge of public highways, which said assistant shall also act as executive officer to the said commission.

Sec. 3. That the said commission, immediately after making the selection of said tract, shall make application to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, at a general or special term, by petition containing a particular description of the property required, with the name of the owner or owners thereof, and his, her, or their residence, as far as the same can be ascertained, and said court is hereby authorized and required, upon such application and without delay, to ascertain and assess the damages occasioned by the taking of said land to each owner thereof or to any person having a legal claim to said damages, in the manner provided with reference to the taking of land for highways in the District of Columbia.

Sec. 4. That the fee-simple of all premises so appropriated for public use, of which an appraisement shall have been made under the order and direction of said court, shall, upon payment of the appraised value to the owner or owners, respectively, or to such persons as shall be authorized to receive the same for any such owners, be vested in the United States; and if, in any case, the owner or owners of any portion of said land shall refuse or neglect, after the appraisement of the cash value of said lands and improvements by said court, to demand the same from the said commission, upon depositing the appraised value in said court to the credit of such owner or owners, respectively, the fee-simple of all such lands shall be in like manner vested in the United States. And the said commission is hereby authorized and required to pay to the several owners, respectively, or to such persons authorized as aforesaid, the appraised value of the several premises as specified in the appraisement by said court, or to pay into court by deposit as hereinbefore provided the said appraised value.

Sec. 5. That said court may direct the time and manner in which possession of the property condemned shall be taken or delivered, and may, if necessary, enforce any order or issue any process for giving possession.

Sec. 6. That no delay in making an assessment of compensation, or in taking possession, shall be occasioned by any doubt which may arise as to the ownership of the property or any part thereof, or as to the interests of the respective owners. In such cases the court shall require a deposit of the money allowed as compensation for the whole property or the part in dispute. In all cases as soon as the said commission shall have paid the compensation assessed, or secured its payment by a deposit of money under the order of the court, possession of the property may be taken.

Sec. 7. That to defray all expenses of inquiry, survey, assessment, payment for lands taken, and all other necessary expenses incidental thereto, the sum of $1,200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That one-half of the sum which shall be annually appropriated and expended for the maintenance and improvement of said lands as a public park shall be charged against and paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, in the manner now provided by law in respect to other appropriations for the District of Columbia.

Sec. 8. That the public park authorized and established by this act shall be under the joint control of the commissioners of the District of Columbia and the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, whose duty it shall be as soon as practicable to lay out and prepare roadways and bridle paths, to be used for driving and for horseback riding, respectively, and footways for pedestrians; and whose duty it shall also be to make and publish such regulations as they deem necessary or proper for the care and management of the same. Such regulations shall provide for the preservation from injury or spoliation of all timber, animals, or curiosities within said park, and their retention in their natural condition, as nearly as possible.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, the proposition to form a public park out of lands lying along Rock Creek, north of the city, is one with which the members of the House are so familiar in a general way that it does not seem to me necessary to enter into any extended remarks upon the subject at this time. I therefore content myself with submitting the bill upon the views of the committee as expressed in their report, and I now call for the reading of that report.

The report (by Mr. GROUT) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred Senate bill (act) No. 4, authorizing the establishment of a public park in the District of Columbia, respectfully submit the following:

The proposition to lay out a public park along Rock Creek is not new. It came up for the first time in the Thirty-ninth Congress in the form of a resolution adopted by the Senate, under which N. Michler, major of engineers, brevet brigadier-general, United States Army, prepared a very interesting and very full report (S. Mis. Doc. No. 21, Thirty-ninth Congress, second session), portions of which are herewith given and made a part of this report. Among other things he said:

"Where so much has been written on so interesting a feature to any large city as that of a park, and where the necessity of public grounds, either for the sake of healthful recreation and exercise for all classes of society or for the gratification of their tastes, whether for pleasure or curiosity, has become apparent to every enlightened community, it would seem to be unnecessary for me to dilate further upon the matter, to say nothing of the natural or artificial beauties which adorn a park, and so cultivate an appreciative and refined taste in those who seek its shades for the purpose of breathing the free air of heaven and admiring nature. It certainly is the most economical and practical means of providing all, old and young, rich and poor, with that greatest of all needs, healthy exercise in the open country.

"In no place has nature been more bountiful of her charms than in the vicinity of this city, and all can be found so near and accessible: the valley of the Rock Creek and its tributaries, the Broad and Piny branches and the several minor rivulets, with the adjoining hills overlooking these beautiful streams, present to the Capital of the nation advantages not to be lightly disregarded in providing a park worthy a great people. All the elements which constitute a public resort of the kind can be found in this wild and romantic tract of country. With its charming drives and walks, its hills and dales, its pleasant valleys and deep ravines, its primeval forests and cultivated fields, its running waters, its rocks clothed with rich ferns and mosses, its repose and tranquillity, its light and shade, its ever-varying shrubbery, its beautiful and extensive views, the locality is already possessed with all the features necessary for the object in view. There you can find nature diversified in almost every hue and form, needing but the taste of the artist and the skill of the engineer to enhance its beauty and usefulness; gentle pruning and removing what may be distasteful, improving the roads and paths and the construction of new ones, and increasing the already large growth of trees and shrubs, deciduous and evergreen, by adding to them those of other climes and countries.

"The valley of Rock Creek occupies a central position to both, as it lies between the Tenuallytown road on the west, one of the most prominent thoroughfares leading out of the one city, and the Fourteenth street road and Seventh street turnpike on the east, two of the finest communications, running in a northerly direction from the other. From these main highways many branches cross the valleys or follow along the banks of the stream. These transverse roads already form beautiful drives.

"Rock Creek winds along for more than 4 miles through the center of the proposed grounds, receiving at convenient points the waters of the Broad and Piny branches and several smaller tributaries. For a short distance it courses through a narrow but beautiful valley, then wildly dashes for a mile over a succession of falls and rapids with a descent of some 8 feet, the banks on both sides being bold, rocky, and picturesque; then passes again through narrow valleys or between high, bluff banks. At many points the creek is capable of being dammed, thus forming a series of lakes and ponds for useful and ornamental purposes. The many deep ravines setting in towards it can furnish romantic walks and quiet retreats for the pedestrian. The larger part of the ground is thickly wooded and capable of great adornment."

Major Michler, in giving a detailed list of the vegetable growth within the limits of the proposed park, names more than one hundred plants, shrubs, and vines, and thirty-six varieties of trees. He also estimates the expense of 1,800 acres to be at an average of $200 per acre, or $360,000, and closes his report with the following language:

"In concluding this report I would respectfully suggest to your honorable committee the necessity of commencing the construction of the national park as soon as practicable. It is a grand and beautiful undertaking, and should be prosecuted with the greatest energy. A sufficient appropriation for inclosing the grounds purchased, for improving and keeping in repair the drives and walks already constructed, and for the laying out of others should be made. For this purpose $100,000 would be sufficient for present expenditures."

This report was made in 1866, soon after the close of the war, and at a time when the country was just beginning to realize the enormous debt incurred in its prosecution, and when all our energies were directed to the work of providing for it, and naturally enough Congress hesitated to make the expenditure, and this first park measure was lost.

The proposition, however, was renewed in the Forty-ninth Congress by a bill which was reported favorably, but was not acted upon in the House.

The same proposition reappeared in the Fiftieth Congress, and a bill was reported favorably by Mr. Hemphill, then chairman of the House Committee on the District of Columbia; and the reasons for immediate action are so well stated in his report (No. 3866, Fiftieth Congress, second session) that we make it a part of this report.

"It seems unfortunate that the earlier endeavors to secure these lands at their then trifling value did not result in their purchase. It appears to be universally agreed that such public parks are necessary in or near large cities, and the result has been that practically all cities of consequence, both in Europe and in this country, and especially all capitals, are in the enjoyment of such pleasure grounds.

"The foresight indicated by the founders of this Capital city in laying out broad avenues and reservations has been already amply justified by the harmonious development of these advantages by persons from all sections of the country.

"The present condition of the District of Columbia and its evident future admonish us that provision should at once be made for such a park as the population of a large and prosperous Capital city demands.

"There are several persuasive reasons why the pending bill should pass, and which will be adverted to briefly.

"The present owners of the bulk of the lands proposed to be taken have held them for a generation or more. Several fortunate results follow from this condition of things:

1. These owners can afford to sell the property at its intrinsic value, and without adding the profits of intermediate speculative purchasers, but each passing year must increase their intrinsic value.

2. There having been but few sales there have been but few trees destroyed to make room for lawns and building sites, and there are practically no costly improvements to be now paid for.

3. The extraordinary natural beauty of the proposed park has thus far been preserved, but its subdivision and the subdivision of portions of it would undoubtedly result in great injury in this direction. The proposed legislation expressly secures the protection of the trees and other natural attractions in the park.

"4. Rock Creek drains a large section of the country practically, and flows through the city of Washington. If residences should be placed along its banks the sewerage would be emptied into that stream and necessarily endanger the health of this city. The consequence would be either that this continuous risk must exist or that this picturesque creek must be covered in and used exclusively as a sewer.

"That portion of the creek along which dwelling-houses have already been built is now an open sewer flowing through the city, from which disagreeable and noxious odors constantly rise, greatly to the detriment of the health of the people along its banks and to the injury of property in that section; and, in the opinion of your committee, the time is near at hand when this portion of the creek must be covered over or some other mode of protection adopted, at a cost of many thousand dollars.

"The preservation of both banks of Rock Creek, as proposed in the pending bill, will at once avoid this danger and cost, and preserve the existing beauty of a large territory. Looking at this measure merely as a practical business matter it seems to be wise. Such a preservation of the natural beauties of a section so near the city will conduce greatly to the physical as well as the moral improvement of the people.

"It is certainly the most economical and practicable means of providing all, old and young, rich and poor, with the greatest of all needs, healthy exercise in the open country." In the passage of this bill by Congress nothing more will be done and in fact not as much as has already been done in many other cities of this and other countries.

"In the report of the park commissioners of the city of Boston for 1885 it is stated:

"Twenty years ago there were but two well advanced rural parks in America; now there are more than twenty. Every city that was then at a parallel stage in the discussion of a park project with Boston now has the project in a large degree realized, and is enjoying the profits of it. * * * London and Paris, Brussels and Liverpool, have each in a generation twice doubled the area of their rural recreation grounds. All the cities of the British Islands thirty years ago possessed but four parks adapted to rural recreation; they now hold thirty, as large in acreage as Franklin Park in Boston."

"There is an impression with some that the civilized world has been swept by a ruinous rage for parks, but not an instance is known of a park adapted to provide for rural recreation that is not regarded by those who are paying for it as well worth all it has cost. No city possessed of a rural park regrets its purchase. During the last year New York City, which has the largest and costliest experience of park-making of any city in the world, has been purchasing land for six additional parks, averaging 600 acres each in area. Chicago has six rural parks, in each of which large works of construction have been completed, and are found valuable beyond expectation.

"Even smaller cities than Boston, such as New Haven, Bridgeport, Albany, Buffalo, and Montreal, have been provided with rural parks. The city of Baltimore paid for Druid Hill Park $693,000, and it has, besides, four other smaller parks.

"Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, was secured at a cost, in round numbers, of $2,300,000.

"Central Park, New York City, was purchased for the sum of $6,253,033.55. The city has, in addition, thirty-eight other parks.

"In Brooklyn, Prospect Park was acquired at a cost of $3,919,370.70. St. Louis has a number of parks, the largest of which was purchased for the sum of $919,958.61. The total acreage of parks in this city is 1,788.59 acres; and, though much of the land was donated, the cost of same amounts to $1,309,944.06 actually paid.

"The ground for the use of a national park in this city can now be condemned at a reasonable cost, and prompt action will not only save many thousands of dollars, but prevent the destruction of the natural beauties of the country along Rock Creek, which are second to those of no other locality adjacent to any city in the world.

"The pending bill seems to provide an extremely satisfactory mode of acquiring title to the land. The process by which the condemnation is effected is the same as that adopted by Congress in respect to the land recently secured as a Library site near the Capitol. Whatever questions may have arisen in respect to proceedings under the latter bill have been settled by the general term of the supreme court of the District of Columbia. It is hoped and believed that the same satisfactory result will be reached in the proceedings under the bill now under consideration."

Your committee have given this bill careful consideration, and in view of the public expectation and desire concerning this park, and the belief of your committee that it will some time be established, and the certainty that it can never be done at less cost than now, and in view of the fact also that while creating it we shall be contributing to the comfort and health and happiness of the present and coming generations, we can at the same time, by giving it the name of that great benefactor of the race, whose discoveries have grown into a solid hemisphere of republics, show our appreciation of the grandeur of his genius and the far-reaching results of his work, and leave this testimonial as a heritage to future ages, we recommend the passage of the bill when amended as follows:

Amend section 1 by striking out in line 5, after the word "creek," the word "or" and insert the word "nor."

Strike out in the same line the word "for."

Insert in line 11, after the words "United States," the words "to be known by the name of Columbus Memorial Park."

Amend section 7 by inserting after the word "the," in line 3, the words "half of the," and inserting, after the word "appropriation," in line 5, the words "and the other half is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia."

Also strike out in lines 5 and 6 the word "provided" and insert the word "and."

Add to section 7 the words "and the other half shall be appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no general debate desired, the Clerk will proceed to read the bill by paragraphs.

Mr. SPINOLA. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill whether he proposes to fix any time for general debate. This certainly is a bill calling for the expenditure of a large amount of money, and it should be freely and liberally discussed. I therefore ask that he agree to two hours on each side if so much time shall be required.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] to state that he submitted the bill to the committee upon the report, and the Chair inquired if there was a demand for general debate, stating that otherwise the bill would be read by paragraphs.

Mr. SPINOLA. I did not understand at the time that general debate was to be cut off. I ask now that two hours upon each side be allowed for general debate.

Mr. GROUT. If there are gentlemen upon the floor who wish to speak to this bill I certainly have no objection. I did suppose, however, that sufficient opportunity would be given to gentlemen to free their minds as the bill was considered by paragraphs. The paragraphs of the bill as read will suggest various questions upon which remarks may be made and I thought that would be sufficient, but if members desire general debate upon this bill I will not object. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. SPINOLA. Let us have a couple of hours on each side. Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in behalf of the committee having this bill in charge that they do not require any two hours for general discussion. Now, if the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINOLA] wants time I am quite willing that he shall take all the time he chooses.

Mr. SPINOLA. I am only one man. Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides for the condemnation of about 2,000 acres of land, at an expense, as I understand, that will be very heavy, and I think there ought to be a reasonable time allowed for general debate. While I am in favor of parks under proper circumstances, I am not in favor of a public park in this city unless good reasons are shown for the same, and I am not in favor of condemning as much as 2,000 acres of land at a heavy cost unless it can be fairly shown that it will be a great public advantage. Therefore, I think that if this bill is a good one it will be benefited by general debate.

Mr. GROUT. How much time do the gentlemen on the other side want?

Mr. SPINOLA. Two hours on this side will satisfy us.

Mr. McCREARY. I suggest to the gentleman in charge of the bill that no limit be fixed at present. Let us go on with the general debate, and if members desire to speak they can be heard, and, on the other hand, if they are satisfied, the debate will soon come to an end.

Mr. GROUT. The committee do not desire any time for general debate. Their report upon the bill, which covers the subject, has been read and is sufficient to make the matter understood by the House; nevertheless, if gentlemen upon the other side will name the time which they desire I think we can come to an understanding.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill for some information which may enable us to fix upon a limit for the general debate. I observe that this report does not give us any information at all about the probable cost of this land. The only estimate that is offered is one thirty years old. Eighteen hundred acres of this land at that time would probably have cost $360,000. The committee have contented themselves with submitting an estimate made thirty years ago. Now, the House would like to know, or at least I as one member would like to know, what would be the cost of that 2,000 acres of land to-day, and then I would like to know further what would be the probable cost per annum of maintaining the park hereafter. I hope the gentleman will give the Committee of the Whole some information upon these points.

Mr. GROUT. If the gentleman had read the bill he would have seen that it makes an appropriation of a certain sum beyond which the commissioners can not go. That sum is $1,200,000, which is supposed to cover the expenses, incidental and otherwise, of purchasing and laying out the park. So much as to the amount.

Mr. HERBERT. But we would like to know the reason the gentleman has for supposing that the estimate is correct.

Mr. GROUT. Well, the commissioners can not go beyond the amount appropriated in the bill, whether the estimate be correct or not.

Mr. HERBERT. But of course the gentleman knows that when we once embark in this project, although we may put in only a million or so of dollars at the beginning, we must go on with it; and I would like to know what his reasons are for making that estimate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the proposition of the gentleman from Vermont touching general debate.

Mr. GROUT. I have asked gentlemen to indicate what time they desire for general debate.

Mr. McCREARY. I suggest that we go on with the general debate for awhile. It is possible that the mere statement of the case may be satisfactory to the House.

Mr. GROUT. Very well; we will let it go on that way for a time. Does the gentleman from Kentucky desire to be heard now?

Mr. McCREARY. No, sir; I desire to hear you. I was about to say to the gentleman from Vermont that I would like him, as chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, to state what the cost will probably be of condemning these two thousand acres of land, who makes the estimates, what they are based upon, and also what will probably be the cost of maintaining the park after it is laid out.

Mr. GROUT. That is a matter of conjecture wholly. In reference to that last question I will say, so far as my own views are concerned, but little money should be appropriated for laying out and developing that park. That land is now opened and will not be developed for many years. It is a work to be attended to by future generations. By buying the land now it is believed it can be purchased at a lower cost than it ever can be again. The longer the delay, therefore, the greater will be the cost. As stated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr.

BLOUNT] it was estimated twenty-five years ago this land could be purchased for $360,000; now it will cost much more.

Mr. Speaker, beyond the inclosure of these grounds when the title is in the United States, beyond that and the erection of an arch over the entrance to the park, whose corner-stone might be laid on the date of Columbus's sailing from Palos in Andalusia some four hundred years ago, I do not think any expenditure should be made there at present. I think the United States should possess themselves of this land, which I believe they can never get at a less cost than now. Let future generations, and as opportunities arise, develop this park into a thing of beauty, when there will be a million of souls here, at the end of the next century.

Mr. McMILLIN. Does not the gentleman from Vermont know that when you embark in an enterprise of this kind you are never able to stop?

Mr. GROUT. I know there is something in the gentleman's interrogatory; I know people will desire to develop this park, but I will say, so long as I remain here, I shall vote against any heavy appropriations for the development of it as a park. Of course drives might be laid out through it.

Mr. McMILLIN. If it is not to be developed, what then is the use of expending a million of dollars if you are not going to make a park out of it?

Mr. GROUT. I did not say we are not to make a park out of it, but I said that so far as I am concerned I would not vote an appropriation for developing it into a park at present.

Mr. McMILLIN. Would the gentleman indicate what he believes to be heavy appropriations? He deals in very general terms in reference to a matter of this importance.

Mr. GROUT. I believe twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars for the first few years would be all that would be required to open drives through this park.

A MEMBER. To make roads.

Mr. GROUT. To make roads in addition to those which are now there.

Mr. McMILLIN. The land is already there, the creek is there, and the sky is over it just as it will be after the gentleman's appropriation. If this does not mean the opening up and developing of this land as a park, I do not know then what it does mean.

Mr. GROUT. It does mean the developing of the park, but not the development of the park in this day and generation.

Mr. McMILLIN. After we have spent $1,200,000 it seems we are not to get any return from that expenditure. It will not be denied the Government has been liberal in laying out parks in this city. Parks add to the health of the city, but here we are going out to take in a part of the country, and a part to which the city may never go.

Mr. CANNON. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. GROUT. I yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I do not want more than three. I have listened to the gentleman's answers and read his bill and report, and I merely wish to say this: For some years I have been somewhat familiar with that section of country, and you may take it from the Klinge Ford bridge on the Klinge road up to the boundary and Rock Creek, and for most of the way I know of no country so well adapted for parking purposes, by hills, ravines, timber, and other surroundings, as that country. And I have got my consent, after reading the report of the gentleman and from my familiarity with that section of the country, to vote for the bill.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAYSON. The first is that the rules of the House require that gentlemen addressing the House shall address themselves to the Chair. Doubtless the dialogue now progressing is the transaction of the public business, but as a matter of fact, in order to understand what is going on, I would like at least to hear that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will request gentlemen to resume their seats and preserve order on the floor.

Mr. CANNON. I say, Mr. Chairman, that I have obtained my consent to vote for the procurement of this site for a public park. I believe that it ought to be secured at once, if practicable, for that purpose.

Now, I heard the question of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN]. Once obtained I believe the expenditure ought to be very inconsiderable for many years to come. In fact, my own belief is that so far as I shall be called upon to vote for appropriations for this park, if the site is obtained, there never will be many improvements placed upon it. I do not think that you can improve very much upon nature as it is along this Rock Creek valley from Klinge's road to the boundary, and it seems to me that the site for this park, with a city growing as this is growing, ought to be obtained now. When once obtained, I repeat, I would be perfectly content to let the future generations take care of its development.

Mr. SAYERS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. I was not in when the bill was read, and I would like to know if it carries an appropriation?

Mr. CANNON. I believe it does. There is an appropriation of a certain amount, one-half from the treasury of the District of Columbia and one-half from the general Treasury, out of which fund payment is to be made for this property, which may be obtained by purchase or condemnation.

Mr. SAYERS. Then another question. Is the gentleman satisfied that the revenues of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year in which this appropriation is to apply are sufficient to meet this demand upon them?

Mr. CANNON. I am not.

Mr. SAYERS. Then, how does the gentleman propose that the District of Columbia shall raise the amount necessary to pay its share of this indebtedness?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ATKINSON] informs me that there was a surplus of $900,000 at the end of the last fiscal year from the District revenues. I have not examined that question as closely as would enable me to give an answer to the gentleman; but I am willing to say to him that I believe so much in the desirability of obtaining now, in the Government, the title to this proposed park that I am content to make provision for its purchase.

Mr. SAYERS. Even if it shall require the issuance of bonds to raise the money?

Mr. CANNON. So far as the District is concerned, yes. I believe it is of sufficient importance to justify it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Vermont yield the floor?

Mr. GROUT. I do not. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. BLOUNT. Before the gentleman gives way, I wish to ask him a question so far as the proposed expenditure here is concerned. I understand that the estimate for this land amounts to about $360,000.

Mr. GROUT. Oh, no; that estimate was made twenty-three years ago.

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, is there any other estimate made?

Mr. GROUT. You mean at the present time?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. GROUT. I am not aware that there has been any particular estimate made. It has been calculated, I will state to the gentleman, that the probable value under condemnation proceedings would aggregate $1,000,000. That is the only estimate that could be made.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is it on that basis that the land is assumed to cost $1,000,000, and for the purpose of which you propose the issuance of $1,200,000 in bonds?

Mr. GROUT. We do not propose to issue any bonds at all. The bill provides for the payment from the revenues of the District of one-half of the necessary amount and from the Treasury the other half.

Mr. BLOUNT. It does not so appear upon the bill.

Mr. GROUT. The gentleman has probably the bill which was introduced in the Senate, and not the bill which passed the Senate.

Mr. BLOUNT. Ah, that is correct; I have been furnished with the wrong bill.

Mr. GROUT. I will hand the gentleman a copy of the bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. I was misled by the bill.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman from Vermont yield for a question?

Mr. GROUT. Certainly.

Mr. PAYSON. I desire to inquire whether the Committee on the District of Columbia have considered this question:

This park at the outset is estimated to cost, in round numbers, $1,200,000. Now, why should not the real estate which is adjacent to the proposed park in locality, and which will be specially benefited by reason of the proposed improvement—why should not this land have a special assessment levied upon it to pay substantially the cost of this improvement, rather than have it pay one-half from the Treasury of the United States and one-half by the District of Columbia generally? Has the committee considered that proposition, and what has the committee to say against it?

Mr. GROUT. If that can be done constitutionally, as the lawyers say, for one I have no objection whatever. I would be very glad to have it done. The committee did consider that question, but felt that possibly it would step upon ground of doubtful constitutionality, and so they declined to base their report upon that feature. Mark you, I do not say the proposition would be unconstitutional, but is one in which that question might be raised.

I will say in reply to the gentleman from Illinois that if he sees fit to propose such an amendment it will have no opposition from me, and I believe from no other member of the committee, and the question can be carefully examined. The committee did not, in the light of what decided cases might exist, examine it with a view of recommending it to the House. There is a clause in the Constitution which declares it should not be done; a section, as the gentleman will remember, the language of which is to the effect that, "nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

Now, while the committee have reported a bill in such way that no portion of the land adjacent to the park and immediately benefited is made to bear more than equal portion of the cost, yet in regard to land not taken belonging to the same owner, the enhancement of its value may be considered in deciding as to the damages; in other words, that the enhancement of the value may be taken into account in estimating the damages. But they thought it best not to incorporate the other feature in the bill.

But if the gentleman from Illinois and other good lawyers on the floor think it can be prudently done, the committee will not stand in the way; because, so far as I am concerned, I do not want any job in this measure by the land-owners on either side of this park. I am conscious it will enhance the value of the outlying lands, no portion of which land will be taken in the condemnation proceedings. There is no doubt of that. It is illustrated by the judgment of the land-owners outside of the city limits, who desired the committee to amend the bill so that the commissioners, laying out the park, would be compelled to go on Rock Creek to the outer line of the District, so as to bring the park nearer to their land lying outside. But the committee thought best not to put such a proposition in the bill.

There were also other propositions. There was one to widen the park as much as possible, and so leave quantities of land inside the District of Columbia unoccupied, which would, it was calculated, enhance this land. But the committee did not think well to make these amendments. They concluded to report the bill as it was, and leave it under the law governing condemnation of lands for highways in the District of Columbia, which allowed the benefits to be considered in estimating the damages.

Mr. PAYSON. I desire to say to the gentleman from Vermont in charge of the bill that at the proper time I shall take pleasure in offering an amendment precisely in that line, and having no doubt whatever as to the legality, and in doing so will give good reasons for my course in doing so.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question which will not be so long as the question of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. GROUT. The question may be short, but the reply required may be a long one, and I have promised to yield to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of New Jersey. But the length of the reply would depend upon the gentleman from Vermont, and not upon myself. Has the committee made any investigation as to the present rate of taxes imposed upon the citizens of the District of Columbia—the percentage to the valuation of their property?

Mr. GROUT. Of what this would cost?

Mr. BUCHANAN, of New Jersey. No, sir. The question I want to ask is the percentage of the tax now imposed by present expenditures upon the tax-payers of the District of Columbia.

Mr. GROUT. Does the gentleman mean to ask if I know?

Mr. BUCHANAN, of New Jersey. Precisely so. Has the committee any information in that respect?

Mr. GROUT. I am not able to give the percentage.

Mr. HEMPHILL. It is $1.50 per $100.

Mr. GROUT. I am told it is a dollar and a half per $100.

Mr. McMILLIN. In the same direction I will ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether there has been an expression on the part of the people of the District of Columbia of a desire to expend for this purpose from their revenues the amount of money that this bill carries.

Mr. GROUT. Yes, sir; there has. Many gentlemen have expressed themselves to the committee as desirous of having this park opened and willing to share in the burdens of it, although they hoped that the General Government would assume the whole expense, as the bill passed the Senate; but it will be noticed that the House committee in reporting it back have put one-half of the expense of the purchase upon the District, and it seems eminently just that it should be.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. Have you heard from the citizens since that change was made?

Mr. GROUT. Yes, sir.

Mr. Chairman, the Committee on the District of Columbia has heard frequently from the citizens, and from no one adversely except one letter which was received by the chairman of the committee and submitted to the committee, and that was before the proposition was made to place any burden upon the District of Columbia for this expense, and it was apparent to the committee, I may say, that interest of only a narrow character prompted the letter.

Mr. PAYSON. One other question I will ask of the gentleman from Vermont. When this project was before the Forty-ninth Congress, as well as the Fiftieth, the House was told by gentlemen having it in charge at that time that many gentlemen of wealth, having large investments in real estate in this locality, were willing and desirous to contribute to the expense of the location of this park. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether any such propositions have been made to the committee in this case; and, if so, what information the gentleman can give the House in regard to it.

Mr. GROUT. No such propositions have been made to the committee, and I think these people expect pay for their land; and they expect much more than a jury will award them under the condemnation process. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROUT. I yield ten minutes.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of establishing the park;

but I am strongly in favor of two amendments to this bill. In section 1 an amendment is proposed by the House committee fixing the name of the park. It is to be the "Columbus Memorial Park." I think the word "Memorial" should be stricken out. It is a mere question of taste. I think it ought to be the "Columbus Park." It may be a "memorial" park; but that may be left to the imagination of the auditor. In Chicago we name our parks after great men. Lincoln Park was doubtless a Lincoln memorial park, from the fact that it was established soon after his death; but it is known as Lincoln Park. We have a Garfield Park, a Douglas Park, a Jackson Park, a Humboldt Park, and a Washington Park; and this ought to be Columbus Park, and not Columbus Memorial Park. But, as I said, that is a matter of taste.

Then again, I think the bill ought to be amended, and my colleague from Illinois will propose to amend it, providing that a proper proportion of the expense of establishing the park shall fall upon the real estate especially benefited by the establishment of the park. In Chicago we have established six or seven parks, and we have established them always in that way. They have not been paid for out of the general taxes; and if they were to have been bought in that way they would never have been established at all. The property especially benefited was assessed for the benefit according to the proportion of the benefit, and every one acquiesced in that plan. As I am occupying the time of the House by the courtesy of the chairman of the committee—and I do not care to take more than is absolutely necessary, as I may discuss the matter under the five-minute rule—I will simply say that I believe that a certain proportion of this expense ought to be paid out of the national Treasury, another proportion from the general revenues of the District, and a third proportion, a large proportion, perhaps the whole, should be paid by the owners of the real estate which is especially benefited by the creation of the park. It is perfectly practicable, and I think that plan should be adopted.

Mr. GROUT. I would like to inquire of the gentlemen who are opposed to this bill, and who want time for its discussion generally, to intimate what length of time they want.

Mr. SPINOLA. Suppose we proceed for an hour or so without limiting debate, because there are a number of gentlemen on this side who may wish to speak.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that in the determination of the amount of time that shall be consumed in this discussion I think it is hardly fair—

Mr. GROUT. I can not yield to the gentleman unless he will make some proposition as to time.

Mr. STOCKDALE. How does the gentleman know that I will not make some proposition?

Mr. GROUT. Very well, if the gentleman has any proposition let him make it.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I propose four hours.

Mr. GROUT. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BURROWS, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration a bill (S. 4) authorizing the establishing of a public park in the District of Columbia, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of gentlemen who are opposed to this bill what length of time they desire now for general debate.

Mr. SPINOLA. Two hours on each side. That will be short enough, and if we can not close the debate by the usual hour of adjournment we can take a recess and finish the bill to-night.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the time proposed is unnecessarily long. If gentlemen will suggest a reasonable time for general debate I shall not object, but the debate so far as it has progressed has related to the substance of the bill and has been of a character which might very well have taken place upon the consideration of the bill by paragraphs. I can not accede to the gentleman's proposition, and I now move that general debate be limited to one hour on each side.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word upon this.

The SPEAKER. This question is not debatable.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested that my proposition is too liberal, so I withdraw it and move that debate be limited to thirty minutes.

Mr. SPINOLA. I move to amend that by making the time two hours on each side.

Mr. GROUT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill (S. 4) authorizing the establishing of a public park in the District of Columbia, and pending that, I move that general debate be limited to thirty minutes.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. I move to amend that by making the time two hours on each side.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. KERR, of Iowa, and it was rejected—ayes 55, noes 65.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to amend the proposition of the gentleman from Vermont so as to make the time three hours.

Mr. MCCREARY. I move to amend the amendment so as to make the time one hour on each side, two hours in all.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. MCCREARY.

The SPEAKER. On this question the ayes are 60 and the noes are 60. The Chair votes in the affirmative, and the amendment is adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes 58.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The motion of Mr. GROUT as amended was then adopted.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering Senate bill No. 4.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. BUEBOWS in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4) authorizing and establishing a public park in the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House, all debate on this bill is limited to two hours.

Mr. GROUT. The friends of the bill are ready to hear from those in opposition to it.

Mr. SPINOLA. Mr. Chairman, I am not particularly opposed to ornamenting and beautifying the Capital of our country; but I wish to admonish the House of one fact: that the surplus in the Treasury is beautifully passing away, and by the time this Congress expires by limitation of law there will be from present appearances no surplus left.

The bill under consideration provides for taking out of the Treasury one-half of $1,250,000. It provides for the appropriation of that much money now in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. The other half of the $1,250,000 is to be taken from the revenues of the District of Columbia. Now, my experience in regard to public parks in cities where I have resided during all my life has taught me this lesson: that the first appropriation asked for such a purpose is only the entering wedge of what will come afterward. The expenditure of $1,250,000 provided for in this bill is only the beginning of an expenditure of $10,000,000 which will be called for before we get through with it. That, sir, is not an overestimate, taking the experience of the past as our guide.

The great Central Park in New York City has cost us about $14,000,000 or $15,000,000, though the original proposition was to expend $1,000,000. The great park in Brooklyn, Prospect Park, was, according to the original contemplation, to cost about $400,000 or $500,000; yet up to to-day the expenditure has been over $5,000,000.

The bill as prepared by the committee of the House made an appropriation for the issuing of bonds for a million and a quarter of dollars, to pay for these lands when they shall be condemned, and provided for an annual appropriation of $50,000 as a sinking fund. That provision the Senate has wiped out; and in the bill before us there is no provision for the issuing of bonds and the carrying along of the expense of creating this park so that those who may come after us may bear a portion of the burden. The bill as now under consideration calls for an appropriation of $650,000 or $675,000 in one gross sum of the unappropriated money now in the Treasury.

Why, sir, do you not suppose that the people of the country are looking at us? Do you not suppose that they have a ledger account against us, and are making estimates and calculations of the amount of money we are appropriating? Sir, it is thirty years in round numbers since this project was conceived. Since gentlemen in this city began to look forward to the time when Congress should be induced to purchase this land almost a decade has come and gone. Then it was estimated that the whole cost of these 2,000 acres would be about $300,000. That in those days was an enormous price for property worth practically nothing lying along the line of this creek, this beautiful stream, as the report describes it, bubbling and gurgling along, while a little further on in the same report we are told of the vile odors and foul airs that come up from it.

There is a beautiful consistency in this report! One portion speaks of flowers and ornamentation, of the odor of beautiful flowers which we are to inhale, while a little further on we are told of the vile smells which are to be encountered along the line of this creek. [Laughter.] Now, I do not know which side my friend from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] will be on in reference to this question; that will depend entirely upon his own taste.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SPINOLA. I have only a little time and I can not yield; though I am disposed to do anything in the world to accommodate my friend.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Just one question.

Mr. SPINOLA. Not now. If we had been allowed a couple of hours on each side I would have been glad to answer all questions that might be put.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINOLA] is entitled to proceed without interruption.

Mr. SPINOLA. Mr. Speaker, I have heard no gentleman yet explain upon what basis the conclusion has been arrived at that this land can be purchased for $1,250,000. There is no evidence on that question before us; no statement has been made in reference to that matter by the gentleman who has this bill in charge. This is simply guess-work; it is a jumped-at conclusion.

The gentlemen who own this land are shrewd, cunning real-estate operators, the greater portion of them; and I do not blame them for their activity in this matter. If they can get the United States to purchase and ornament this park for their benefit, they are simply doing what I, perhaps, if I were in the same position, might do. But I am not here for any such purpose as that. I am here to protect the Treasury of the country against just such invasions as this bill proposes. I am here to try to save, if possible, to posterity some small portion of the surplus which has been in the Treasury during the last few years.

Our friends who favor this bill should bear in mind another thing. We had here a day or two ago a debate in which it was stated that twenty thousand of the comrades of my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and myself are now in the poor-houses of the land. Assuming that to be the fact, then, instead of taking $625,000 out of the Treasury and applying it to the purchase and ornamentation of a great park, let us appropriate it for the erection of soldiers' homes, so that we may take those veterans that saved our Government out of the poor-houses and place them in comfortable homes for the rest of their lives. That would be a laudable thing. Such an appropriation would be one upon which we could meet our people at home and say, "Yes; we did appropriate $625,000, but it was to take care of the men who took care of you during the struggles of the war." Yes, sir; one-half of a million and a quarter of dollars—

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. One million two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SPINOLA. I believe the gentleman is correct; the Senate in their generosity have cut the amount down $50,000.

Now, sir, there are a great many peculiar rumors afloat in regard to our Senators. They are all honorable men, I admit; nevertheless they are human, if rumors can be believed; and their humanity is like that which we find in most other men. They are fond of finding the tender spots upon the surface of the earth where they can invest their surplus capital; and the amount invested in this city, if rumor can be relied on, will run up into millions.

Now, I know of no reason myself why one-half of the expense of this park, if it is to be created at all, should not be borne by the property immediately surrounding it, and which will derive the great benefit to accrue from the establishment of this park.

When Central Park was laid out in New York City you could buy lots for from $500 to $1,000, but since then some lots have been sold at from $50,000 to $100,000 apiece. Is there any reason why these lands, if they are all they claim them to be, should not stand part of the burden of the taxation to pay for this purchase? Why should not the citizens of the State of my friend from Vermont, why should not the thrifty and industrious farming people he represents, be called upon to pay for a park in the city of Washington—I will not say for the benefit of those who own the land in it, but for the benefit of the speculators who own the land adjoining the park. For, sir, those are the men who are to derive all the benefit and who bought all the land they wanted for speculation at a few cents a foot and which to-day is held at a very high price.

Mr. CUMMINGS. The gentleman has referred to speculators who are interested. Let me ask him this question: Are any members of Congress included amongst these speculators, so far as he knows?

Mr. SPINOLA. I do not mean to give myself away. [Laughter.] If there were I would not tell you. [Renewed laughter.] I do not tell secrets out of school. I do not know; but there are rumors, and rumors sometimes tell the truth. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. And sometimes they do not.

Mr. SPINOLA. And sometimes they do not, as my friend from Virginia says.

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend says the Senate reduced the amount of the House bill. Is it not true, while the sum of money is appropriated—is it not also provided it is for the purchase of land not exceeding 2,000 acres, which may cost a much larger sum than is here appropriated?

Mr. SPINOLA. If it costs more to carry out the idea we will have to pay for it, for it is provided we are to purchase not exceeding 2,000 acres.

Mr. BLOUNT. And when it purchases 2,000 Congress may find it is bound to appropriate $1,000,000 more.

Mr. SPINOLA. When they condemn not exceeding 2,000 acres, and the commissioners appraise it and they say it is worth $3,000,000, the Government is committed and we can not get out of it. When they come here with the appraisement we will be compelled to make an appropriation to meet it, and we will find it will be absolutely necessary to carry out what Congress has done in this regard.

As I said at the commencement, Mr. Chairman, my actions are based on the experience of the past, and it is just this, that the amount provided will only be the corner-stone of what will be the future expense.

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] says they will make drives through this park for $20,000. You can not commence to do it for that. Why, it would take that much to make surveys. If you lay out a park along that stream the surveyor's fees would be more than that. It will be nearly $100,000 or $125,000.

It is all a sham to say that this will be enough to commence this thing with. Next year you will have to pay half a million of dollars to carry it on.

I have no objection to making Washington the handsomest city on the earth. I do not know but I would vote to-day to take every inch of land on the south side of the avenue and put public buildings on it. But this scheme, and that is the only thing I can call it, is for the benefit of the men who own the land around it. It will not be made available for park purposes during my life, and I expect to live a long time to come; I do not purpose to turn in my chips for a long time. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. Let me ask the gentleman from New York, what is this park to cost?

Mr. SPINOLA. The first provision is $1,200,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman in charge of the bill says there has been no estimate made at all.

Mr. ATKINSON, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from New York says this is for the benefit of the adjoining owners. Does the gentleman not know every newspaper to-day of this city favors the taking of this land for this park; that the popular sentiment favors the establishment of this park?

Mr. SPINOLA. Undoubtedly the newspapers are in favor of it; certainly they are; they expect to get "some of the pork" themselves. [Laughter.]

Mr. ATKINSON, of Pennsylvania. Are they adjoining owners?

Mr. SPINOLA. The hog has got to be cut up, and the two or three newspapers here expect to get a piece.

Mr. ATKINSON, of Pennsylvania. Have you any authority for that statement?

Mr. SPINOLA. No, sir; only my own opinion.

Mr. ATKINSON, of Pennsylvania. And is that based upon any knowledge of the facts?

Mr. SPINOLA. It is based upon common sense.

Mr. ATKINSON, of Pennsylvania. That is a poor kind of common sense.

Mr. SPINOLA. That is my common sense. It has never failed up to this time, anyhow.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. SPINOLA. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKEN. How far is it from the center of this city to this proposed park? How far from here?

Mr. SPINOLA. I can not tell you.

Mr. ATKINSON, of Pennsylvania, was recognized.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I simply wanted to know how far the children would have to go in order to get out there and play.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. SPINOLA. If I can be permitted to answer I will.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I would like to find out whether I misunderstood the gentleman or not. Did I understand him to say that he opposed the creation of the Central Park in New York?

Mr. SPINOLA. Oh, no, sir; you did not understand me to say anything of the kind. I simply said this—

Mr. STOCKDALE. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Perhaps I should put my point more in the shape of a question. As I understand the rule, after a gentleman has spoken and yielded the floor, he can not resume it to answer a question. Now, can other members, by exercising a privilege of asking questions, also exercise the right of calling him to the floor again?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman from New York had yielded the floor.

Mr. SPINOLA. I was only answering the gentleman through courtesy, I supposed.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman had not yielded the floor when I interrogated him. I wanted him to explain to the House this point: Suppose even that the men in New York had made hundreds of thousands of dollars on account of the location of Central Park where it was established, does the gentleman think that would be any reason for refusing to establish a public park in this city?

Mr. SPINOLA. Oh, no; but we paid for our park ourselves.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. What objection have you to the people here having a park?

Mr. SPINOLA. I have no objection to them having a park if they do as we did in New York, pay for it themselves. But you want to take the public money to pay for it. New York has paid for her own park, and now you want us to help to pay for yours.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. But that does not answer the question. The proposition here is to create a park in this great city. Now, it can only be done by Congress. The people here have no voice of their own in the matter, and the city can not do it for itself.

Mr. SPINOLA. I know it can not.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. It is impossible in this confusion to hear a word that is going on in the House.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan). The Chair will state that when gentlemen refuse to obey the Chair when they are called to order, the Chair is not to blame for the noise. He hopes hereafter that when the committee is called to order there will be at least quietness on the floor until the decision on the point of order is made.

Mr. ATKINSON, of Pennsylvania. One of the reasons why I have favored this park project, or scheme as my friend from New York [Mr. SPINOLA] characterizes it, is because of one of the things he pointed out as an inconsistency in the report of the committee. He says that the committee's report declares that pure water flows down Rock Creek; and it also states that because of the "vile smells" of that creek it has become a common nuisance. The explanation of this seeming inconsistency is my principal reason for supporting this park project.

Wherever Rock Creek flows through the built-up portions of the city, there its waters are polluted; there it becomes a source of disease and danger to the people who reside in its neighborhood in the cities of Washington and Georgetown. But when you approach Rock Creek at that portion where there are no buildings, you there find a pure and beautiful stream, which should be preserved in all of its beauty. The only way to secure the preservation of the purity and beauty of that stream is to take it and this valley as a public park, and keep buildings away from it so that it may not be polluted by the sewage of a dense population.

It is true as this creek passes through Georgetown it gives forth noisome smells, and only last year a proposition was before this House to arch the creek over in order to preserve the health of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, through which it passes. If this project of arching the stream had been adopted, the amount of money necessarily expended for that purpose would have almost equaled the proposed cost of this park. For the benefit of those who are to come after us, for the benefit even of the present citizens of these two cities, it is necessary that no more buildings shall be erected upon that creek.

How solicitous gentlemen appear to be about the surplus in the Treasury! They are apprehending that if we expend $600,000 of the money belonging to the United States to buy this park, then some dire calamity shall occur or it will be an evidence of gross extravagance on the part of this Congress. Why, this rapidly disappearing surplus that you speak of has been, during this session, almost untouched; only a single appropriation bill, I believe, has yet become a law; and I suggest that apprehensions of gentlemen on this point are entirely without foundation. Their solicitude is unnecessary.

This city is not well supplied with parks compared with the other great cities of this continent; and its park facilities should be increased.

The city of Paris, it is said, has 170,000 acres of parks.

Mr. PAYSON. One hundred and seventy thousand acres! Oh, no.

Mr. ATKINSON, of Pennsylvania. One hundred and seventy thousand acres of parks within its environs and in easy reach of the city; and I refer you to the American Encyclopedia as my authority for the statement.

All the other great cities of this continent have great parks. The city of Philadelphia has the great Fairmount Park, containing 2,740 acres. The city of St. Louis has 2,100 acres of parks; the city of Chicago has 1,900 acres; the city of San Francisco has 1,100 acres; the cities of New York and Brooklyn have 1,600 acres, and the parks of London, England, including the commons, are said to contain 13,000 acres of land.

Now, in comparison with the park facilities of these other cities, I hold, sir, that Washington is but illy supplied with parks, and for that reason, if for no other, we should now make this appropriation in order to secure Rock Creek Park. I shall not enlarge upon its beauties; other gentlemen may do that if they choose, but that it is the most desirable location for a park to be found anywhere is conceded alike by the friends and enemies of this bill.

My friend from New York [Mr. SPINOLA] draws a touching picture of the 20,000 soldiers in the almshouses and suggests an appropriation of $600,000 for them instead of for this park. I surely do not understand him as saying that if we make this appropriation for the park therefore these soldiers can not be relieved. We know that if this park bill passes, as I hope and believe it will, none will be quicker to vote for and support an appropriation for these old soldiers than my friend from New York. It may be more meritorious to relieve them than to establish a park here, but both measures are meritorious, and both can be adopted, and still there will be a surplus, as the gentleman seems so much to desire, in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. MILLIKEN. If my friend would allow me a question, I do not know whether he has stated the fact, as I did not catch the first of his remarks; but I would like him to state how many acres of parks there are in the city of Washington.

Mr. ATKINSON, of Pennsylvania. I can not state that accurately.

Mr. MILLIKEN. But the gentleman has stated what they are in other cities.

Mr. ATKINSON, of Pennsylvania. I should think that perhaps the best source to which I can apply for information would be to call upon my friend from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I believe, however, that the Mall contains a couple of hundred acres of land in the original reservation that is open to the public. Then we have the grounds of the Soldiers' Home, which have not cost the Government of the United States anything out of the Treasury. I call the attention of my friend from Maine to the fact that while there are reasonably fair park facilities for the old part of the city of Washington, yet there are almost no parks at all in the great and growing northwest of the city.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I would like to state—

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania state what the urgent necessity for it is?

Mr. ATKINSON, of Pennsylvania. Yes; I will. I have tried to impress that on the mind of my friend from Illinois.

Mr. PAYSON. I should like to hear you state what the necessity is.

Mr. ATKINSON, of Pennsylvania. It is to prevent men from building in the valley of Rock Creek. If buildings are put there for men and for animals the water coming through that creek will be polluted by the sewage and the result will be that the health of the District will suffer. In recent years more attention has been given to the rules of sanitary science than ever before; and I desire to bring to the attention of the House a brief extract which I clipped from a newspaper a day or two ago in relation to what has been done in that direction in the State of Michigan. Public health is the most profitable of all investments for public money.

Dr. Henry B. Baker, secretary of the Michigan health board, recently showed in an address that the sanitary regulations of the State had shown a decrease in the mortality from preventable diseases; that the saving now amounted to 100 lives per year from small-pox; 400 from scarlet fever; and 600 from diphtheria; in all, 1,100 lives from the improved sanitary condition in the State of Michigan. It will not do for us here, empowered as we are to legislate for the District of Columbia and having under the Constitution the exclusive power of legislation, to neglect the health of this District. We are its legal guardians, uninfluenced almost by public sentiment, because, no matter what the sentiment of the District of Columbia is, it can not reach the ears of members of Congress, whose time is absorbed in attending to the affairs of their own districts and of the nation; and with this trust imposed upon us, Mr. Chairman, I conceive it to be our duty to legislate as carefully for this District as we would for our own State or for the nation at large.

We can not disregard the sanitary condition of this District. Congress has not disregarded it. If you will look to the Potomac River you will see the dredgers at work engaged in filling up the Potomac flats. More than half a million dollars has been expended in that work already, and it is not yet completed. What is the purpose of it but to preserve the health of this District? For the same reason, I insist, that we should take possession of this part of Rock Creek and reclaim it; so that its pure waters may flow unpolluted to the Potomac. I relinquish the balance of my time to the chairman of the committee.

[Mr. STOCKDALE addressed the Committee of the Whole, and withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. GROUT. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE, of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was first brought before the Committee on the District of Columbia it struck me very unfavorably. The proposition, as it came from the Senate, was that the entire expense of this public park should be imposed upon the United States, and the declaration was made specifically in the first section of the bill that it was wholly for the people of the United States. Now, here were two propositions that seemed to me quite untenable. The first was that a public park in the city of Washington could possibly be paid for out of the Treasury of the United States on the assumption that it was not to be for the special benefit of the people of the city of Washington.

It struck me as a very extraordinary, not to say absurd, proposition; and when the matter came up I had the honor of proposing that one-half of the cost of this park should be imposed on the real estate and personal property of the District of Columbia. A little discussion convinced the committee unanimously that if this proposition was to be carried through one-half of the cost should be imposed on the real estate and personal property of the city of Washington, which was to receive the greatest benefit from it.

Now, is this park wholly for the people of the United States, as set out in this proposition? I admit that it will be in a degree for the benefit of the people of the United States and I agree that the people of this country, as they come to this national park in future years, after the park shall have been developed, will find there one of the attractive points of interest. To them, then, it is a matter of value and a matter of attraction. But, gentlemen, it will be of more attraction and more value to the people of the city of Washington. It is to be their breathing place; a place for their summer recreation; they are to receive, in the first place, the greatest and most direct benefit from it.

We now have the bill in a shape that we can reasonably consider, and the question meets us, Has the time come when the Congress of the United States should provide a great public park for the national Capital? The question whether public parks are a desirable accessory for national capitals is a question of the past in this country and in the world. There is no mistake on that point. There is not a capital city in the United States, not a capital city in Europe to-day, but has spent its hundreds of thousands or its millions for the development of great parks for the benefit of the people.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINOLA] warned us against the expense that will attend the establishment of a great public park at the national Capital. He said he had had experience in New York City in observing the development of the great Central Park, and he warned us that this park, if established, would be a perpetual expense to Congress and the people of the United States.

The inference that the gentleman would have us draw is that in the purchase and development of the Central Park the great city of New York has made a mistake, has taken "an elephant" upon itself. Why, sir, does not that gentleman know that within two years the Legislature of his State has permitted the city of New York to purchase in addition to the Central Park 3,600 acres of land for six central parks, at an expense of $12,000,000? New York City, the great commercial metropolis of this country, has found Central Park so advantageous to its prestige, so profitable to its material interests, that it proposes to go into the business by the wholesale.

Yet the gentleman would have us believe that New York has not found Central Park a profitable institution. Why, sir, there is no place in New York City which for attractiveness, for value to the city, can be mentioned in comparison with the great Central Park. There is no gentleman on this floor who has visited New York who has not sought, as the first point of interest, that great park, the beauty and attractiveness of which are now conceded by all. The question before us simply is whether here this afternoon in providing for the future of this great Capital city we shall make timely provision for a similar institution at the Capital of the country.

A gentleman on my left has told us that this will be the first time when this Government will have gone into partnership with the District of Columbia in the purchase of a park. I do not know whether that gentleman is as green as I am as a member of this House; but I am not green enough to be ignorant of the fact that at the very last session of Congress a park of 160 acres was purchased in this city, and the United States Government went into partnership with the District of Columbia in its purchase. This is no new proposition; it is a just and proper proposition that this Government, which has this city of Washington, this District of Columbia, under paternal care, shall, in the great improvements that are made here, when it decides they are proper and necessary and wise, put its hand in its pocket like a generous guardian and say that it will pay one-half the expense. That is a wise and a just policy; we have ingrafted it upon this bill and ask the other branch of Congress to meet us on that proposition.

Mr. Chairman, I have only one word further to say. The gentleman from New York has characterized this as a scheme, a private scheme, a speculator's scheme. Who owns this Rock Creek property out here? Is there any speculator in the city of Washington that owns one foot of it? If so, what is his name? The property in question is owned exclusively and absolutely by families that have resided here for a hundred years; and they can be counted on my fingers' ends. There is not a real-estate speculator in the whole number. The gentlemen who are specially interesting themselves in this project are gentlemen who simply represent the best interests of the city of Washington and have no other motive than to provide this city, the Capital of the nation, with a great breathing-place for the thousands who are to reside here. Not one of these gentlemen, I am satisfied, has a dollar's worth of interest in this real estate, and not one of them will receive a dollar's worth of pecuniary benefit from this project.

Our friend from Mississippi has plaintively alluded to the "ancestral homes" that will be desecrated by the purchase of this park and its condemnation by the Government. Sir, I took pains the other day to go out and look over the ground contemplated for this park and to view the "ancestral homes" there. I found just one. It was a log cabin, or the next thing to it, and its residents were two old colored people. So far as I know, they are the only residents in that portion of Rock Creek that will be incorporated in this park if it is purchased by the United States. That is the "ancestral home" that you and I are asked here this afternoon to preserve and shield from the desecrating hands of the United States. I am not afraid of that "ancestral home." But I look to see in coming years a home for the people of this city in this Columbus park—a place like Fairmount Park in Philadelphia, Lincoln Park in Chicago, that glorious old "Common" in Boston, Mass., and that Central Park in New York—where the people of this entire country will find comfort and joy in this unobtrusive retreat.

Mr. SPINOLA. I yield now for ten minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether it should be a matter of any concern to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union as to what amount of money this bill will require from the Treasury of the United States. Certainly there is nothing in the report of the committee, there is nothing in this bill which reckons that as a matter of any consequence. The only reference to the probable cost of these grounds with which we are furnished by the committee is an old estimate made in 1866, nearly a quarter of a century ago, but there is not an intimation in the report of the value of that property to-day. The city of forty or fifty thousand population has run up to a population of 300,000. The value of that period can not be contrasted with that of to-day.

Now, is there anything in the bill to help the House in this matter? Not in the least, as will be seen by reference to the language of the bill. What is the limit of the expenditure? I ask your attention to the first section of the bill.

It is provided, Mr. Chairman, as follows:

That a tract of land lying on both sides of Rock Creek, beginning at Klinge Ford Bridge, and running northwardly, following the course of said creek, of a width not less at any point than 400 feet, including the bed of the creek, of which not less than 50 feet shall be on either side of said creek nor more than 500 feet on either side of said creek south of Broad Branch road and Blagden Mill road, and of such greater width north of said roads as the commissioners designated in this act may select, shall be secured, as hereinafter set out, and is perpetually dedicated and set apart as a public park or pleasure ground for the benefit and enjoyment of the people of the United States, to be known by the name of Columbus Memorial Park: Provided, however, That the whole tract so to be selected and condemned under the provisions of this act shall not exceed 2,000 acres.

If it is competent, therefore, for these commissioners, without reference to cost, to go out and select 2,000 acres at this point when they are selected, what follows?

It is then provided—

That the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, the president of the board of commissioners of the District of Columbia, and the engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, appointed a commission to select the land for said park, of the quantity and within the limits aforesaid, and to have the same surveyed by the assistant to the said engineer commissioners in charge of public highways, which said assistant shall also act as executive officer to the said commission.

Again—

The commission, immediately after making the selection of said tract—

There is nothing said about the cost—

shall make application to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, at a general or special term, by petition containing a particular description of the property required, with the name of the owner or owners thereof, and his, her, or their residence, as far as the same can be ascertained, and said court is hereby authorized and required, upon such application and without delay, to ascertain and assess the damages occasioned by the taking of said land to each owner thereof or to any person having a legal claim to said damages, in the manner provided with reference to the taking of land for highways in the District of Columbia.

Instead of reading this bill, as I would like to do, I am compelled, in the brief time allotted to me, to confine myself to merely reading extracts.

It is then provided:

SEC. 4. That the fee-simple of all premises so appropriated for public use, of which an appraisalment shall have been made under the order and direction of said court, shall, upon payment of the appraised value to the owner or owners, respectively, or to such persons as shall be appointed to receive the same for any such owners, be vested in the United States.

There is not a word here about the cost. Not exceeding 2,000 acres are to be selected. When condemned by the commission and the fee-simple vested in the United States, are you to be led into the belief that, because a million of dollars is after this to be appropriated for payment of lands taken and other incidental expenses, one-half to come out of the District of Columbia and one-half out of the United States, that means any limitation? Not so.

The first and second paragraphs are conclusive as to damages. The property is to be condemned and their rights vested at once. The appropriation of $1,000,000 has nothing to do with the size of the park or the cost of it. When you have your bill what is your guaranty? At the next session of Congress it will be alleged the property has been condemned and the amount of money appropriated does not appear to be sufficient to pay for the property which has been condemned.

I say, sir, I would like to know whether in the face of this bill this House, reckless of the cost of this park, is going to shut its eyes to the possibility of the enormous expenditure which may flow from it.

A good deal has been said about the necessity of a park for this Capital and of parks for all the great cities throughout the world, and hence this bill must pass. Is that a fair inference as to the necessities of Washington? From this Capitol down to the river lie over 200 acres of land, a beautiful drive along the banks of the river, and adjoining that the flats are being reclaimed, the estimates of the engineers being that we will have 700 additional acres there, making 900 acres of land in one body constituting this park. Few other cities in the land have such parks as that.

In addition to that we have little parks all over the city in every direction you may turn. So far as the northwest portion of the city is concerned what more beautiful ground can there be than that out towards the Soldiers' Home? What a resort it is to-day, not only for Washingtonians, but for the people of the United States from all parts of this country who visit the Capital. Does it render it the less attractive or beautiful or any less inviting because, forsooth, it does not take any money out of the Treasury of the United States? Is that the beautiful part of the park, the money part of it, the large portion of money for the purchase of ground in the northwest portion of the city?

Mr. GROUT. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Hooker].

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, the proposition for the creation of a public park in the immediate vicinity of Washington is not now for the first time submitted to the attention of the Congress of the United States. On the contrary, this proposition was made many years ago. The earliest date regarding this matter refers to what was known as Senate bill No. 549, introduced in the Thirty-ninth Congress. Upon this bill Major Michler, of the United States Army, made a full and elaborate report to the Senate on the 29th day of January, 1867. Again, on the 12th day of February following, Senator B. Gratz Brown called up the Senate bill, as will be seen by reference to the Congressional Globe, part 3, second session of the Thirty-ninth Congress, 1866-'67, page 1577, and made an elaborate speech upon it.

At various times afterwards the same proposition was submitted for the consideration of the Congress of the United States, and in 1883 a memorial signed by three prominent citizens of Washington, Messrs. W. W. Corcoran, W. Strong, and Josiah Dent, was presented to Congress praying for the establishment of such a park, and in the House of Representatives on the 23d day of July, 1886, a bill was introduced, read twice, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and on January 31, 1887, this bill was reported from the committee, was referred to the House Calendar, and, with its accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

At a subsequent time, in the Senate of the United States, namely, on the 23d day of April, 1888, Mr. Beck, of Kentucky, introduced a bill for the purpose of establishing what was considered a part of this park at that time; and at a subsequent period, in the House of Representatives, on January 9, 1888, a similar bill was introduced and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed; and on July 20, 1888, the bill was reported with amendments, referred to the House Calendar, and ordered to be printed. A similar bill was presented in the Senate on the 21st day of December, 1888, and again in the House of Representatives on January 24, 1889; which bill was read three separate times, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed. On January 26, 1889, the bill was reported with amendments, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

In the last Congress of the United States, the Fiftieth Congress, a similar bill was introduced providing for the purchase of similar ground for the establishment of the park near Washington; and in the able report which was made by the chairman of the committee in the last Congress, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL], he gives some data as to what had been the cost of parks in various other cities of the United States, and I will only read a small portion of that very able report, where he says:

Even smaller cities than Boston, such as New Haven, Bridgeport, Albany, Buffalo, Montreal, and others, have been provided with rural parks.

I call the attention of the committee especially to the cost of procuring and laying out these parks as set forth in the able report of the learned gentleman from South Carolina, who was chairman of the committee at that time. From this report it will be gathered that the city of Baltimore paid for Druid Hill Park $693,000, and it has besides several smaller parks. Fairmount Park, in the city of Philadelphia, was secured at a cost, in round numbers, of $6,300,000. Central Park, in New York City, was purchased for the sum of $6,323,033.55; and the city from which my eloquent friend, General SPINOLA, comes has, in addition to that, other parks costing large sums of money. Prospect Park, in Brooklyn, was secured at a cost of $3,919,370. St. Louis has several large parks, the largest of which cost $849,058.61, and the total acreage of the parks in that city is 1,788.59. Although much of the land was donated, the cost of the same amounted to $1,309,944.06.

Now, Mr. Chairman, at present ground suitable for a national park here in this city can be obtained by condemnation or otherwise at a reasonable cost. We can see by the instances cited by the chairman of the committee for how small a sum, comparatively, this ground could have been purchased twenty years ago. It is to-day, of course, much higher; but every day grounds are growing more and more valuable; and if a park is to be established in the vicinity of Washington similar to those which are established in every other great city of the country, it seems to me that every day and every hour and every Congress it is delayed and postponed enhances the value of the ground and makes the purchase of that which could be had comparatively cheap now a subject of considerable enhanced expenditure in the future.

Besides that, the proposed park does not lie at a distance of 6 miles from the city of Washington, but only 3, and perhaps less. The ground may be purchased at a small sum, comparatively speaking, while it is increasing every year in value. It is also stipulated in the bill that the District of Columbia shall pay its one-half proportion for the purchase of the ground to be condemned. And in answer to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] with reference to taxing, for the purpose of this bill, the lands adjacent to the park, I believe that measure would be in a degree impracticable, but the ground adjacent to the park, when it is created, will be greatly increased in value, and in proportion to that increase they all bear their burden of taxation imposed for the creation of the park.

Sir, in the great parks adjacent to the large cities of this country, New York, Philadelphia, Boston, St. Louis, Chicago, and even in the great National Yellowstone Park, on which the Government has spent so large an amount of money for its creation and preservation, we have samples of what has been done by the Government and what has been done by the great cities of the country. Is it, therefore, improper that this city shall have a park when it is the seat of the National Government, the place of all others where the citizens of the United States do congregate to enjoy the objects of national interest? Shall it be said that this city alone ought not to have a park? Why, sir, what is the great object of interest to the visitor who goes to the great commercial metropolis of this country—New York? His first drive is to the great Central Park of New York, which cost, as I have said, over $6,000,000.

It has been said that this expenditure was designed and intended to benefit the wealthy and the rich, and not the poor. Why, sir, it has been the design of every city of this country in establishing parks that they should be for the poor as well as the rich. They are open to all. The pure air and sunshine are breathed there alike by the poorest as well as the wealthiest. I shall never forget that a few years ago when I visited the great city of New York and went, like other strangers, to its great Central Park, in taking my seat in one of the boats on one of the magnificent artificial lakes which adorn that park I saw a plainly dressed woman take her seat in the same boat with me, and heard the expression of gratification: "Thank God! Here the air and the sunshine are free alike to the poor as well as the rich."

This is one instance where all are benefited alike and proved that there is a place of recreation in the city of New York where the poor, as well as the rich, can go, "without money and without price," when they go to the great Central Park. So in Fairmount Park, Philadelphia; so with the two great parks I have driven through in St. Louis, and so in the magnificent parks of that great city that sits upon the banks of the glittering lake—Chicago, where you have determined to hold the centennial of 1892. They are the lungs of the city. They are the avenues where all classes of people mingle; they belong to nobody, but are especially designed for the benefit of those who can not make a place of recreation for themselves.

I submit, therefore, sir, that it is a proper time now to adopt a suitable bill, if this is a suitable bill—and I have not had time to examine it in its details—but I say that its purpose and object ought to commend it to the Committee of the Whole and to the Congress of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose at this time to discuss the matter that I specially have in mind in connection with this bill. I rise now more for the purpose of calling attention to the amendment which I shall offer when the bill shall be under consideration by sections for the purpose of amendment, rather than to discuss the general features of this bill.

I have heretofore opposed the passage of this bill and in its present form shall oppose it now. I shall endeavor to be brief in what I have to say here. In the main, as to many things that are desirable, which we propose in legislation, they are not always a necessity; and for the public park in this locality, as to the necessity for it, Mr. Chairman, I insist that the burdens that it imposes ought to be borne by others than those contemplated by this bill. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. MOORE], a member of the committee, is pleased to say that he had the honor of proposing, in the bill which is now under consideration, that one-half of the expense should be borne by the people of this District. That is not a discovery. That has always been upon the proposition since it first came before Congress, so far as I am advised.

I have in my hand, Mr. Chairman, a bill reported to the Fiftieth Congress by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL], whom I now see before me. The proposition was the same then as now: that one-half of this expenditure should be paid by the people of this District and the other half out of the general Treasury. One phase of this question has not been presented here in argument by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT], the chairman of the committee. He says that the proportion of cost which the District of Columbia will be expected to pay under this bill can be paid out of the funds that are now in the treasury of the District. From that it would appear that there is a plethora of money in the treasury of the District in the hands of the District authorities now. Will the gentleman remember that the funded debt of this District to-day is $20,000,000 and that the annual taxation of the District is $1.50 on each $100 of assessment? And I bear in mind another point. It is proposed that the District be liable for one-half of the public expenditure.

I remember an observation that I made in the Forty-ninth Congress from the seat now occupied by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] adjoining me, when it was proposed in that bill, as it is in this, to spend $1,500,000 for this park, which is so far in the country that it can not be seen from this Capitol, that in the great northeastern portion of this city there was not a paved street connecting it with the southeast portion of the District. There was not a paved street there then, and I believe there is only one there now. Then, sir, one of the public schools in this District was in such a condition that its furniture and appliances would be a disgrace to a country district in the State of Illinois. One door in a school-house in the northeast quarter of this city was only held closed by being propped by a fire-shovel. [Laughter.] Yet we have money enough to enter upon this expenditure for this breathing-place, as it is called.

Let me say in this connection to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ATKINSON], whom I do not see in his seat, but whom I see beyond the rail, when he undertakes to say that this city is more deficient in breathing-places for the poor than any other city in this country or in the known world, I meet that statement with this assertion: that no city is better provided in that regard than Washington is to-day. Those gentlemen who are in favor of this bill point to us the great cities of this country and institute a comparison between the city of Washington and the great cities of New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and Chicago on this continent, and to London, Liverpool, and Paris. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that there is not what is known in a metropolitan sense in the city of Washington a single tenement house, such as there is in the city of New York for tenement purposes, of four, five, and six stories high.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Nor is there in Philadelphia.

Mr. PAYSON. Possibly they are not in Philadelphia, but in these other cities I know they are from personal observation.

I say there may be a necessity for breathing spaces in such cities, but will the gentleman bear in mind that there is not one such house in the whole city of Washington, and never will be? Mark the prediction: This city will never be a manufacturing city. There will never be that crowded population here, block upon block of poor laboring people, who from necessity are compelled to herd in such localities.

Mr. ATKINSON, of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman deem it desirable that there should be tenement houses here?

Mr. PAYSON. No, sir, I do not; but I am talking about the actual fact. And now, Mr. Chairman, coming to what I rose to say, if this park is deemed to be desirable that phase of the question I do not propose to debate further, provided those whom in the first instance it specially and specifically benefits shall pay their proportion of the cost of it. I propose, at the proper time in the consideration of this bill, to offer as an amendment a proposition which finds itself in the statute laws of the State of Illinois and which, I am advised, is to be found in the statutes of nearly every State in this Union, a provision that where public improvements of this kind are projected and consummated a special assessment shall be laid first upon the property which is to be specifically and directly benefited by reason of the improvement, and pro tanto that that shall be paid first, and if, after that, the cost of the improvement shall exceed the direct benefit conferred upon the adjacent property, then it may be paid for, one-half by the District of Columbia and the other half from the general Treasury. That proposition not only commends itself to the good sense and the good judgment of the people everywhere, as I think, but it is the result of the experience of legislators in all localities this Union over.

The great South Park that we have in Chicago was paid for substantially in that way; the extension of Lincoln Park, on the North Side, was made substantially in that way; the great string of parks on the West Side was made substantially in the same way; and I am told by gentlemen from the city of New York that one-half the cost of Central Park was paid in the same way. Now, knowing, as we all do know, that this park has for its promoters and instigators gentlemen who have made large investments in country property for speculative purposes—and I do not criticise them for that—it seems to me that this proposition should commend itself with special force to our acceptance in this case. That property in the northwest is held for speculative purposes and this great improvement, which will run ultimately into an expenditure of four, five, or six millions of dollars, will greatly benefit that property. This bill innocently says that "$1,200,000 is hereby appropriated," but that is only a starter.

This scheme began a few years ago with $500,000 as a "rider" upon the District appropriation bill. Then a little more was added, and more specific terms were used in the bill, until here we have a proposition for a park to which there is no limit on the north, for there is no limit in this bill as to the distance these commissioners may go in that direction. They are restricted, it is true, to 2,000 acres of land, but the width is narrow, and nobody can tell or can predict what will be the northern limit of the park. There certainly is no limitation of it in the bill, nor is there any limit to the cost.

The report which comes with this bill from the Committee on the District of Columbia is more remarkable for what it does not contain than for what it does contain. No estimate is given as to the cost of this project, no statement of the basis upon which it shall be made—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYSON. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman owes the committee about a minute. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROUT. I now yield one minute to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER].

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, I have asked the gentleman to yield me one minute more to add a word which I had not time to say while I was on the floor before. The amount of land proposed to be taken for this park is only 2,000 acres. In comparison with the acreage allotted to parks in our great cities or even in some of the smaller cities of our own country, this is quite small, but when you come to contrast it with the amount of acreage embraced in the parks of the great cities of the Old World it sinks into insignificance. In London alone the acreage in parks is 22,000 acres. In Paris the acreage in parks is 58,000 acres. In Vienna the acreage is 8,000; in Berlin it is 5,000 acres, and in Dublin it is 1,900 acres. This is a proposition to create a park of only 2,000 acres, with a provision that full compensation shall be paid to the owners of the property under the processes by which property is usually taken for public purposes.

As to the question of the power of the District to bear its portion of these taxes, if it be true, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], that there will be an increase in the value of the lands adjacent to this park, then they will have to bear their ratable portion of the District's share of the cost of this enterprise.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, following what has been said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], I will state that in the last Congress a good deal of complaint was justly made that the money which we were appropriating here for the District was used for the purpose of advancing the interests of men living or owning property in the suburbs, while at the same time the public streets of the city were neglected. And I remember it was said very generally that this came to pass on account of the large social influence of the men who were projecting these enterprises and favoring these projects because they had so much money invested in the suburbs. Now, within the last few days we have had an illustration of that. We have been told, and I have no doubt that it is correct, that the late President of the United States has sold a tract of land, which was aided in the improvement of its value by the appropriations of Congress, for $100,000 more than it cost him two or three years ago.

Now, this kind of improvement is in the same direction. Common justice would have required, if the principle could have been applied, that this large increase of value in property adjacent to the Zoological Park should be paid for by the men who have reaped such large sums of money from the advance in price; and such a measure is very properly suggested by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. Chairman, I undertake to say that the city of Washington is today better provided with parks than any city of its size in the country. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has mentioned the fact that Chicago has 2,100 acres devoted to public parks. What has Washington? There is the reservation down here south of the Avenue, embracing 200 acres or more. There is Soldiers' Home, with 640 acres. There is Arlington, with 300 or 400 acres. There is the Rock Creek Zoological Park, with 200 acres. The land appropriated in this city to public parks far exceeds the amount appropriated for such purposes in St. Louis or Chicago.

We have been told what space is appropriated for public parks by European cities. One gentleman tells us that Paris has 58,000 acres appropriated to such purposes; another gentleman makes the amount 170,000 acres. I rather think the gentlemen do not know how many acres that city has. But at any rate I believe there is no necessity in this city at the present time for any additional ground for parks.

The city of St. Louis found, as it grew, a necessity arising for parks; and public-spirited citizens gave the necessary ground for that purpose. One St. Louis gentleman, Mr. Shaw, has made his name immortal by giving to St. Louis that large park which is now talked of as having been paid for by the city. I say that as this city enlarges, if it does as much as is claimed—

Mr. HEARD. Will the gentleman allow a correction?

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEARD. The park to which allusion was made as having been purchased by the city of St. Louis was not the Shaw Park, but the Forest Park, a very large body of land in the northwestern part of that city.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. I knew that the Tower Grove Park had been given to the city by Mr. Shaw. But as I was saying, this city will no doubt be provided with additional parks by public-spirited citizens when the time calls for such gifts. To-day large sums of money are being expended to improve the flats down here by the river; and we all know that, as they are rescued from overflow, they will be beautified and made places of resort for the people, who will be able to go there without expense, as they frequent now the various reservations of the city.

Mr. HOOKER. Will it not take two hundred years to make a park upon the reclaimed ground of the flats, at the rate at which the work has been proceeding?

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. I understand that in a few years the bed of that river will be lowered some 15 or 16 feet; and then all that ground will be reclaimed, affording a breathing-place for the people.

Mr. Chairman, this city of Washington is growing to be a very expensive necessity to the people of the United States. We are beginning to think, out West, that if the people here want breathing-places they should provide them by taxing themselves, just as Chicago, St. Louis, and other places have done. We are voting large sums of money for expenditures in this Capital. At the last session we voted $6,000,000 for a public building here; and other necessary public buildings are being provided for at this session. People from other parts of the country who come here are thinking it is about time that the people of Washington, if they want these expensive luxuries—matters which are not necessary for the support of the Government—should pay for them themselves.

Mr. HEARD. Does not the gentleman understand the fact that the people of this District, if they were willing to pay the entire expense of this or any similar project which they might think desirable for the interests of their city, are nevertheless utterly powerless to do so unless express authority be given by Congress? In other words, while Congress has the power to spend all the money which may be gathered by taxation from the people of the District and placed in the Treasury of the United States, the people themselves without the authority of Congress can not spend one cent of the money so collected.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. In answer to the gentleman, I will say that if he will introduce a bill to authorize the people of this District by popular vote to tax themselves for public parks the proposition will have my earnest support.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont has twenty-four minutes remaining; the time of the other side is exhausted.

Mr. GROUT. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD].

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, without committing myself to the support of this bill in its present form or in any other form which it may probably assume, I want to impress on the House this fact: I believe it is the conviction of the majority of this body that the property which it is contemplated by this bill shall be purchased for park purposes ought to be so secured and reserved. I believe that is the common opinion of this House. Now, I want to suggest further that the proportion of taxation for the expense of public improvements in this District which by existing law is apportioned to the Federal Government is one half; in other words, the District pays one half of such expenses and the General Government the other half. If that basis is wrong as applicable to this measure, it is perfectly competent for Congress to modify the rule and require this District to pay more or less than one half, as may be deemed proper.

But if this House believes that the District should pay more than half, or even the whole, of this expense, while it also believes that this ground should be reserved, that the power should be vested somewhere to purchase it for the purpose of reserving it, let us at least enact such a law as may authorize the securing of the ground, though the District may have to pay the entire expense. We do not want to lose sight of the fact that it is necessary to have express authority from Congress for this purpose, since the District can not spend one dollar of its own money for any purpose until authorized by Congress, although Congress can spend the money of those people without their consent.

It is competent for the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR] to offer an amendment of that character to this bill, as it is for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] to propose that the expense to be incurred in the purchase of this ground shall fall largely upon the property in the immediate neighborhood, or property which, in the judgment of the commissioners, will be largely increased in value.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. Would it be proper to compel the citizens to bear this expense without submitting the question to a vote?

Mr. HEARD. I had not considered that Congress would probably compel this District to pay the whole of this expense, though it may so decide. As to the suggestion of suffrage in this District to settle any question, the gentleman from Iowa is as competent to decide such a matter as I am.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEARD. I do not understand how my time is curtailed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] yielded to the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. HEARD. Well, I have said about all I care to say. I simply wanted to impress on the House the fact that the District is powerless to buy this ground or do anything else with the money collected by taxation of its people without the authority of Congress; and if this House believes that ground ought to be purchased and set apart as a park, even though it wants to make the District pay the whole expense, we ought to pass a law which will authorize the acquisition of the property by the District; otherwise the District can not take any step in the matter.

Mr. GROUT. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] the remainder of the time.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to detain the House with any very lengthy discussion of this measure. Some points which have been made against it by gentlemen who I have no doubt are earnest in their opposition seem to me to be rather unfair, and therefore I desire in defense of the committee to make a statement which will set us right before the House and the country.

It is stated there is no limit either to the amount of land to be acquired or the amount of money to be paid for it. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] read the first section of the bill, but failed to read a part of the fourth section, which I think puts a limit on the amount of money.

Mr. BLOUNT. I referred to it.

Mr. HEMPHILL. But you did not read that which I think puts a limit on the amount of land to be acquired and the amount of money to be paid.

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not have time to read the whole of it.

Mr. HEMPHILL. After limiting the acreage to 2,000 acres, the bill provides that the land—shall, upon payment of the appraised value to the owner or owners, respectively, or to such persons as shall be authorized to receive the same for any such owners, be vested in the United States.

So that when these commissioners condemn this land and go to court and the value of the property is assessed and the money paid for it, then it becomes the property of the United States, but until that time it is the property of the individual.

So before the United States can acquire the property the commissioners must condemn it, and they can not condemn it unless they pay for it. They can not pay for it, of course, unless the money is appropriated, and this bill appropriates only $1,200,000. So there is an absolute limit as to the amount of land to be taken and the amount of money to be paid for it.

Mr. BLOUNT. Has the gentleman time to allow me to submit a question?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is it not true the commissioners are authorized to go on and lay off as much as 2,000 acres of land, no valuation being made at the time?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. Are they not authorized to go into court and have it condemned?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. Without reference to valuation up to that point?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. Suppose the valuation of 2,000 acres shall exceed by double the amount of bonds authorized to be issued in this bill in money, what will be the probable action of the commission?

Mr. HEMPHILL. The proposed action has not—

Mr. BLOUNT. It is proper for us to understand that when we are legislating. They would go into court, and if they have money enough they would pay for it. Is it not inevitable we would be compelled to pay for the balance of the tract?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Oh, no. There is but one way to limit this amount, and that is to say there shall not be more than 2,000 acres of land taken, and to say it shall not cost more than $1,200,000. You can not say what it is to cost unless you go into court and the jury pass upon it. If the commissioners have laid their hands on more than they can pay for, the owner does not cease to be the owner and the property does not vest in the United States until the money is paid. If the money is not paid, the land does not come to us.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYSON. Is there such a limit in the bill?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes; in section 4, page 3.

Mr. PAYSON. Read it.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I have read it to the House.

SEC. 4. That the fee-simple of all premises so appropriated for public use, of which an appraisal shall have been made under the order and direction of said court, shall, upon payment of the appraised value to the owner or owners, respectively, or to such persons as shall be authorized to receive the same for any such owners, be vested in the United States.

And until the money is paid the title does not vest.

Mr. PAYSON. Where is the gentleman reading?

Mr. HEMPHILL. From the fourth section, third page. I suppose the gentleman has the wrong bill.

Mr. PAYSON. I have the Senate bill.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Is it the Senate bill reported by the committee?

Mr. PAYSON. Does not that refer to the specific tract?

Mr. HEMPHILL. It refers to the condemnation of the land the commissioners may select.

And another thing, Mr. Chairman; this $1,200,000 is not the only money to be used for this purpose, though it is the limit fixed for the expenditure; because it is expressly provided that when a portion of a tract of land is taken for the purpose of this park the benefits which are to arise from the laying out of the park by the enhancement of property values shall be assessed against the remainder of such property. So if a man has a hundred acres of land adjacent to the park and it is decided by the commissioners that they will take one-half of the land, and the remaining half is enhanced in value so as to become equal to the value of the whole before the establishment of the park, in that event we do not pay the holder of the land a cent. That, however, we can not compute for ourselves.

It is a subject to be ascertained by the jury. The jury must first pass upon that question. And now the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] proposes to further amend the bill by inserting an additional proviso that if lands adjacent to the park are enhanced in value by the laying out of the park, although no part of such tracts are taken, but if there be a substantial enhancement in value, such lands shall also pay a portion of the assessment.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. But who is to determine the question of enhanced value?

Mr. HEMPHILL. That is to be determined by the jury drawn under the regular forms of law prescribed in the District, the law that is in operation for the settlement of all such questions relating to the condemnation and appraisal of lands for public purposes. It is further provided that if either side is not satisfied with the decision of the jury, express provision is made for an appeal to a second jury, so that justice can be done to all.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. But I mean in reference to the increased value?

Mr. HEMPHILL. The jury decides as to the increase in values.

Now, in addition to that, so far as the Committee on the District of Columbia has been enabled to ascertain by a most thorough, diligent, and honest investigation of the question, this proposition is as free from the taint of speculation as any scheme or project, as gentlemen have called it, that has ever been proposed to this or to any other legislative assembly. Further, I will say that the property proposed to be taken for the purpose of this park is owned, as has been said by the gentleman from New Hampshire, by a set of people who have not petitioned Congress to take it for any purpose. Not a single owner of land has appeared before the committee in this Congress, with one exception. One owner appeared and stated his position in regard to the matter, but we refused to amend the bill as he asked that it should be amended.

There can be no objection to the expenditure of this money, therefore, for the establishment of this park and the taking of this land, upon the mere assumption that somebody or other is to be benefited by it. In the consideration of a proposition of this character, where the transaction is plain and open, it is not a question whether somebody is going to be benefited by it or whether somebody's property is to be injured by it. The true question and the only question, if the propriety of the work commends itself, is whether it is a reasonable and proper expenditure for the benefit of the people and all the people. That is the question, and if somebody makes money or if somebody loses money by it that is a matter which should not influence a single vote in this House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is hardly worth while to take up a great deal of the time of the committee in discussing the question as to whether or not this park is needed. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the objections of various gentlemen, who have founded their arguments upon different phases of the question; but I have not found one which addresses itself to my mind as likely to influence any man who wants to do justice to the people of the District. Some gentlemen say that we ought not to vote money from the public Treasury to lay out a public park in this city. But gentlemen must remember that the Congress of the United States has taken upon itself the decision of all questions relating to this District. It has deprived the people of the District of the right to determine what shall be done with their money or whether they might appropriate that money for a public park or for any other purpose. Practically they have no control of the matter. They are not permitted to say whether they will vote their own money to purchase this park or not.

Mr. BLOUNT. And they are not very anxious to do it, I understand.

Mr. HEMPHILL. That may be, and if I were a property-owner in this District, which I am not, I would be in favor of the present system of Government as opposed to the old system. But when Congress takes upon itself the power and authority to appropriate the money of this people without their say-so, it does not lie in the mouth of Congress to say that that which is done in every other city in the land, where the people are permitted to control their own affairs, shall not be done for the people of this city and this District. Congress has taken to itself the right to decide how the money shall be spent. Shall we refuse to spend it according to the wishes of the people or in that manner which seems to be dictated by common sense? The experience of the world is that what is proposed here is done in all other cities which control their own affairs.

Now, what is the park for? What is the use of it? The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE] consumed much time in talking of "pleasure drives." I am a poor man myself and I represent a poor people; but I never have yet, and I hope I never will in the future, be moved by that spirit which objects to a man riding in a park or on good streets, provided he is able to pay for the privilege. If I can not ride I can walk; and I am as much entitled to the free air of heaven and the benefits of a public park as the man who is able to drive in his carriage. But the principal object of the park is to meet the needs of this rapidly growing city; and unless gentlemen are going to pass a statute to prevent the increase of the population of the city of Washington some provision must be made for a public park when this city becomes much larger than it is to-day.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Certainly.

Mr. STOCKDALE. In that view of the case, and to which I assent—that the gentleman has a right to ride in a park if he is able to pay—do you believe that the Government of the United States has the constitutional power to take from a man, or from the people, their property for the purpose of establishing a pleasure park, and not for necessary public purposes?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Oh, it has been decided over and over again, and every city in the Union takes private property for such purposes. If that is what troubles the gentleman, it need not concern him in the least.

Mr. STOCKDALE. That is the gentleman's answer?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir; that is the answer.

Mr. STOCKDALE. That is hardly a fair answer. The gentleman seems to evade the question.

Mr. HEMPHILL. And further, Mr. Chairman, the poor people are as much interested in this as the rich people. There can be no better investment of public money to a reasonable and just extent than to provide some place where the poor people shall have an opportunity to go and where they may reap the benefits which come from communing with nature.

We know that the rich people of this city, as well as any other place, can go to the seashore in the summer or they can go to the mountains when diphtheria or any other complaint of that kind appears in the city; but the poor people of the city are not able to get away from it. I say that there is not a poor man or a rich man of this city who has come to the District Committee and protested against the appropriation of this money for the purposes for which it has been asked. This measure, as has been suggested, has been before Congress in various ways for a number of years, and not a single man, woman, or child has protested against it so far as I know.

In addition to that, I want to ask any gentleman if he knows of the citizens of any city of this Union who have ever petitioned that a park once laid out should be taken and devoted to private use? The city of New York, that has spent $15,000,000 on the great Central Park, does not ask that that park shall be reappropriated to private uses and that the people shall give up their claim to it. The city of Philadelphia does not ask, sir, as far as Fairmount Park is concerned, that it should be again devoted to private use.

There is not a gentleman on this floor who does not realize that it was a wise thing in the original design of this city that provision was made for public parks, circles, and squares; and as the city is spreading out to-day we are doing exactly the same thing. If we are going to be governed by the utilitarian sense of this, let us sell these magnificent grounds around the building where we are now. They are utterly useless so far as any practical purpose is concerned. No crops are produced on them. But no man here would stand up and go in the face of civilization by asking that the ground which surrounds this Capitol of the nation should be sold out and private buildings put upon it; and if this bill is passed and this park appropriated to a public use I will guarantee that no man will come to this House in any future year who will be willing to introduce a bill here to ask that this property shall become private property and be devoted to private uses.

But in addition to that, Mr. Chairman, I believe that the land on this creek must either be made a public park or the creek will become a common sewer for all that part of the city. These two things I know, that the land on Rock Creek can be either made a beautiful, health-giving park or the creek will be a sewer which would stink in the nostrils of this District and breed disease among the people who live in proximity to it.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that there is anything more that need be said in advocacy of this measure. I think it is one that ought to pass, and I think that this measure is as free from private gain as any that will ever be introduced on this floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed for general debate has expired. The Clerk will now report the amendments recommended by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 8, after the word "creek," strike out the word "or" and insert "nor."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next amendment, as follows:

In the same line strike out "for."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next amendment, as follows:

In line 15, after the word "States," insert the following: "To be known by the name of 'Columbus Memorial Park.'"

Mr. ADAMS. I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out the word "Memorial," so as to leave it "Columbus Park."

Mr. GROUT. The committee makes no objection to that amendment. The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee as amended.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee. Does the gentleman desire to be heard?

Mr. BLOUNT. Oh, no.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the first section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a tract of land lying on both sides of Rock Creek, beginning at Kingle Ford bridge and running northwardly, following the course of said creek, of a width not less at any point than 400 feet, including the bed of the creek, of which not less than 50 feet shall be on either side of said creek, nor more than 500 feet on either side of said creek south of Broad Branch road and Blagden Mill road, and of such greater width north of said roads as the commissioners designated in this act may select, shall be secured, as hereinafter set out, and is perpetually dedicated and set apart as a public park or pleasure ground for the benefit and enjoyment of the people of the United States, to be known by the name of Columbus Park: Provided, however, That the whole tract so to be selected and condemned under the provisions of this act shall not exceed 2,000 acres.

Mr. PAYSON. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the first section the following:

"Nor the total cost thereof exceed the amount of money herein appropriated."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 1 the following:

Provided further, That after the survey shall have been made and the boundaries of the park proper designated, the commission shall then cause to be surveyed a tract of land of 600 acres contiguous to said park proper, the title of which shall be vested in the United States as herein provided for the park proper. That 300 acres thereof shall be divided into squares and lots and sold, the profits thereof to be applied to reimburse the United States and the District of Columbia for the outlay in the purchase of the park. That the other 300 acres shall be divided into squares and lots and held by the United States, and buildings erected thereon and leased for a perpetual income to defray the expenses of keeping up the park, which said property shall be so sold and leased as Congress shall hereafter provide."

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, is not that amendment subject to a point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. GROUT. It is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think it subject to the point of order.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I desire to say—

Mr. GROUT. I withdraw the point of order. I will waste no time on that.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I desire to say of this amendment, if the Government has power to condemn people's property for a pleasure park, it has the same power to condemn 2,600 acres that it has to condemn 2,000 acres. It will be no greater hardship upon the owners who shall be deprived of the 600 acres than it will upon those who will be deprived of the 2,000 acres; and if the Government is to adopt this high-handed measure I can not see why it may not avail itself of the same power and create a fund that will perpetually support and keep up the park without expense to the Government. The greater the city becomes and the greater the expense of the park the greater will become the income.

Therefore, if this additional 600 acres shall be condemned the property outside of that again will be enhanced in value and these 600 acres can be so utilized by the Government as to defray the expense of this park and refund the purchase-money, while the other 300 acres can be so used as to yield a perpetual income to defray the current expenses of the park. So that, according to the argument of the gentlemen who favor this bill, particularly the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL], who says that it is not a question as to whether anybody will lose by it or will make by it, but is a simple question of benefiting the people of this District—in that view, I say, it is entirely proper to take this additional land and make a perpetual pleasure ground without costing the Government a cent. Doubtless gentlemen who favor this bill will well say that the Government has no right to forcibly take people's property to maintain a pleasure park. So I think; but if no power exists to take property to maintain it no power exists to take property to make it. I will oppose the bill even if amended, because I think it wrong in principle and a usurpation of power, and one object of offering this amendment is to emphasize that feature of the bill; but if the House is determined to fasten this everlasting expense on the people I say this relief measure ought to go with it.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. STOCKDALE, and it was rejected.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] has removed, in a measure, the objectionable character of this bill, but not entirely. Under the provisions of the bill it is the absolute duty of these commissioners, not limited by this appropriation, to go on "to lay out and prepare roadways and bridle-paths, to be used for driving and for horseback riding, respectively, and footways for pedestrians," etc. I do not know what amount that will add to the appropriation. It is not, however, that which concerns me.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] has attempted to classify the friends of this bill as the men who appreciate what is just to this District and the opponents of it as utilitarians who by their position would be logically compelled to go on and propose to sell the public grounds now owned by the Government in the District of Columbia. Sir, I do not belong to either class, but as a portion of the money proposed to be expended by this bill is to be taken, not from the District of Columbia, but from the people of the United States, I must bear in mind that my constituents and the constituents of other gentlemen upon this floor are interested in determining the question as to how far the public treasure shall be expended in this city.

Mr. Chairman, this is a beautiful city. Its elegant homes, its beautiful streets, its parks, its drives, its wealthy population, its many attractions, are all very fascinating. But there are communities elsewhere, sir, in my own State, in the Northwest, and in various parts of this country, which are less beautiful, where the property of the people is mortgaged for millions upon millions of dollars, and where they are interested not entirely in the question of beautifying this city, but rather in the question of relieving their own situation and improving their own conditions, so that they may be relieved from the oppression of the creditor and be animated again with hope for the comfort of their homes and of the little ones about them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLOUNT. I withdraw that, and I now move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. GROUT. I hope the gentleman will let us come to a vote.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, this is a good large sum which is proposed to be appropriated by this bill, and I do not see why my friend wants to rush it through in this way. I suppose it will not bear investigation and therefore debate had better be omitted. The committee has not given us any information about the probable cost of this property. Perhaps they did not think it necessary.

Gentlemen may think that there is no trouble about making these expenditures. There are always those upon this floor who animadvert upon gentlemen who seek to retrench public expenditures. I do not mind being designated as in favor of economy in public expenditures. I know that that is the only road by which taxation is to be reduced. I know also that those who are interested in these expenditures are always quite ready to criticize the lack of a liberal spirit and of broad-mindedness on the part of those who interfere with their schemes.

I care not, sir, for criticisms like that. Only a few days ago there passed here without objection a bill appropriating $1,000,000 taken from the farmers all over this land to obtain information as to the mortgage indebtedness of the country for the purpose of disclosing to the American people that expenditures are too high, that taxation is too high. Gentlemen may ridicule retrenchment now, but the time is coming when the voice of the people will be heard. You may think it humble now, but then it will be dignified, potent, and terrible. The spirit which is abroad in this land may be laughed down here now in the interest of parks and drives and such things, but the hour is coming sooner or later when it will execute its will in this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The amendment of Mr. BLOUNT was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, the president of the board of commissioners of the District of Columbia, and the engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, appointed a commission to select the land for said park, of the quantity and within the limits aforesaid, and to have the same surveyed by the assistant to the said engineer commissioner in charge of public highways, which said assistant shall also act as executive officer to the said commission.

During the reading of section 2 the following took place:

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I wish to be heard a moment upon that.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman please wait until the Clerk has completed the reading of the section? and then he will be recognized.

Mr. SPINOLA. I move to strike out the last word of the section just read.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] withdraw his motion that the committee rise?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I made such a motion.

Mr. SPINOLA. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas made a motion in the midst of the reading of a paragraph, which the Chair will now recognize if he insists upon it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to; there being—ayes 100, noes not counted.

The committee accordingly arose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BURROWS reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (S. 4) to establish a public park in the District of Columbia, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. GROUT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Pending the motion to adjourn, the following business was transacted by unanimous consent:

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KENNEDY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 1296) for the relief of the owners, officers, and crew of the British bark Chance; and

A bill (H. R. 6099) granting an increase of pension to Elmer A. Snow.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President, by Mr. PARDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed acts of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 5682) to amend an act entitled "An act to constitute Columbus, Ohio, a port of delivery, and to extend the provisions of the act of June 10, 1880, entitled 'An act to amend the statutes in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes, to said port of Columbus, Ohio,' approved February 9, 1889;"

An act (H. R. 5825) prescribing the times for sales and notices of sales of property in the District of Columbia for overdue taxes;

An act (H. R. 4130) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River between the city of Pierre, in Hughes County, and Stanley County, in the State of South Dakota; and

An act (H. R. 7617) to authorize the Oregon and Washington Bridge Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Columbia River between the State of Oregon and the State of Washington and to establish it as a post-road.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, from the Committee on Appropriations, it was ordered that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from further consideration of the following executive documents, and that they be referred to the Committee on Commerce, namely:

House Executive Document No. 257, letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending establishment of proper lights at Doller's Point and on Hog Island Wharf, James River, Virginia.

House Executive Document No. 270, letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending establishment of light station at or near mouth of the new cut-off channel, Baltimore Harbor, Maryland.

House Executive Document No. 272, letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending establishment of a fog-signal at or near the Cuckold's Island, in Townsend Harbor, Booth Bay, Maine.

WORLD'S FAIR OF 1892.

On motion of Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, it was ordered that House bill 8393, in reference to the world's fair of 1892, be reprinted with the report and appendix.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. PENNINGTON, for Tuesday, the 25th instant, on account of important business.

To Mr. COTHRAN, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. PERRY, indefinitely, on account of important business.

ALIENS IN GOVERNMENT EMPLOY.

Mr. SMYSER. I ask unanimous consent that the petition which I send to the desk be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The petition is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, citizens and residents of the city of Akron, county of Summit, and State of Ohio, respectfully represent that certain laws of the United States, to wit, those which have reference to the erection and construction of United States public buildings, navy-yards, fortifications, or other structures or works which require the services of skilled or unskilled labor in their erection, are, in their opinion, inadequate for their protection as citizens and taxpayers, inasmuch as it appears there is no provision in said laws which secures to citizens of the United States the right to labor on such Government works in preference to aliens, and especially so when such works or structures are let by contract from the Government to firms or individuals.

Cases of this nature have come before the notice and observation of your petitioners in various sections of the country, who, as the representatives of a skilled craft, feel aggrieved that such Government work would be performed by aliens who render nothing in return for the opportunities and benefits so given them, to the detriment of citizens and tax-payers who support and uphold the Government by their means and ballots.

This is particularly the case wherein the works in question require the services of skilled labor in the construction of brick and stone masonry, of which craft we, your petitioners, are representatives, and we therefore respectfully pray that your honorable body will amend the laws so that in all Government works, whether let by contract or otherwise, none but citizens of the United States shall be employed thereon, and that proper penalties for the enforcement of the same be imposed upon such contracting firm or individual for each and every violation of the law.

Witness our hands and seal, and in behalf of the members of Subordinate Union No. 7, city of Akron and State of Ohio, of the Bricklayers and Masons' International Union of America, this 18th day of March, 1890.

[SEAL.]

H. N. JASPER, President.

A. G. WILSON, Recording Secretary.

The motion of Mr. GROUT that the House adjourn was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE AND OTHER COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

SURVEY OF WATER WAY FROM LAKE MICHIGAN TO ILLINOIS RIVER.

Letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter of the Chief of Engineers, accompanied by twenty-six sheets of maps, which he recommends be printed to accompany the published report of Captain Marshall, as contained in House Executive Document No. 264, present Congress, on the survey of a water way from Lake Michigan to the Illinois River at La Salle, Ill.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

TRANSFER OF BUREAU OF PENSIONS.

RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, the following resolution was introduced and referred as follows:

By Mr. BAKER:

Resolved: That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to report to the House whether in his opinion the project to open a channel between Lake Ontario and Irondequoit Bay may be inaugurated, as demanded in justice to the commerce of the lakes, and whether the increased and growing commerce now centered at the port of Genesee will not, by such improvement and new project, be afforded necessary additional facilities, and whether the facilities now afforded to shipping and commerce in the present harbor at Charlotte are not now restricted and rapidly becoming insufficient for the purpose of a harbor of refuge. And, further, that the Secretary of War report whether said Irondequoit Bay will, if utilized for the purposes of a harbor, better subserve the uses of commerce and afford largely increased facilities for shipping, as well as for purposes of refuge in case of storms and during the winter, and whether such additional project will afford desirable supplemental facilities to those now existing at the present harbor in the river at Charlotte; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Chuks, recording secretary, praying Congress to enact such laws as will secure to skilled and unskilled laborers who are citizens of the United States preference over aliens in the erection and construction by the Government or by contract of public buildings, navy-yards, fortifications, and other structures and works; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. PLATT presented a petition of Subordinate Union No. 11 of the Bricklayers and Masons' International Union of America, of Middletown, Conn., praying that on public works employment be given to citizens of the United States in preference to aliens; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. DAVIS presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Mankato, Minn.; resolutions of the bar of Polk County, Minnesota; resolutions of the bar of Becker County, Minnesota; resolutions of the bar of Clay County, Minnesota; resolutions of the bar of Norman County, Minnesota, and resolutions of the bar of Marshall County, Minnesota, in favor of the passage of House bill 4587, providing for the terms and places of holding the courts of the United States in the district of Minnesota; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of 51 citizens of La Crescent, Houston County, Minnesota, praying for the free coinage of silver; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Winona, Minn., praying for the passage of the bill to establish an Indian industrial school at Pipestone, Minn.; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ALLEN presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Washington; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, STATE OF WASHINGTON,
Office of the Secretary of State.

I, Allen Weir, secretary of state of the State of Washington and custodian of the seal of said State, do hereby certify that I have carefully compared the attached instrument of writing, i. e., House memorial No. 17, for removing obstructions to navigation in the Upper Columbia River, with the original now on file in my office, and that the same is a correct transcript therefrom and of the whole of said original.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said State at Olympia, this 17th day of February, A. D. 1890.
[SEAL.] ALLEN WEIR, Secretary of State.

[House memorial No. 17.]

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the State of Washington, respectfully represent that the Columbia River, one of the great water ways of the world, can, with slight expense, be made navigable from Kettle Falls, in Stevens County, State of Washington, to a point in British Columbia more than 280 miles distant; that said river above said falls traverses a country of unequalled fertility, rich in the precious minerals, in coal, iron, marble, and limestone, and in vast forests of pine, fir, and cedar trees; that Northeastern Washington, in the center of which lies the great and thriving city of Spokane Falls, needs to be brought into connection with said country by means of said river in order that there may be a mutual interchange of products; that the said Columbia River is navigable in British Columbia to and above the crossing of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the said country will be greatly benefited by the competition for its freights of that great transcontinental line; that Kettle Falls, on said Columbia River is the natural and only point at which it is practicable for lines of railway and other highways to approach said Columbia River from Northeastern Washington, and that a line of railway from Spokane Falls to said point is now completed to within a few miles of said Kettle Falls, namely, the Spokane and Northern Railroad; that the only obstructions in said river above said Kettle Falls for more than 280 miles are at a place called the Little Dalles, in said Stevens County; that said obstructions are inconsiderable and can be removed and the river rendered navigable at all stages of water at an expenditure of not to exceed $50,000, as is shown by the report of Lieut. Thomas W. Symonds, Engineer Corps, United States Army, made in the year 1881, Senate Executive Document 186; that considerable traffic between Northeastern Washington and said British Columbia has existed and been carried on by means of a line of steam-boats above said Little Dalles, but all freights to and from said boats has been required to be freighted by teams for a long distance over difficult and dangerous roads, and for that reason the said traffic has languished and nearly died away, but that the said traffic will be revived and immeasurably increased with the completion of the line of the said Spokane and Northern Railway Company to said Kettle Falls, and with the removal of the obstructions in the said river at the Little Dalles.

Passed the house January 29, 1890.

J. W. FEIGHAN, Speaker.

Passed the senate January 31, 1890.

CHAS. E. LAUGHTON, President.

Mr. SPOONER presented a petition of the Bricklayers and Masons' International Union, of La Crosse, Wis., praying for an amendment of the laws so that none but citizens of the United States shall be employed upon Government works; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Wisconsin, urging the passage of Senate bill 1020, to authorize the President to restore Edwin R. Parks to his former place in the Army; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of John E. Perkins Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Wisconsin, of Augusta, Wis., praying for the passage of the dependent pension bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HISCOCK presented a petition of the Soldiers and Sailors' Association of Courtland County, New York, praying for the passage of the per diem rated service-pension bill; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Michael Collins and others, members of the Bricklayers and Masons' International Union of America, praying for the amendment of certain laws of the United States relating to the erection of public buildings; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a memorial of the Boot and Shoe Workers' International Union, remonstrating against any treaty being made with Russia of a certain character; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. INGALLS presented a petition of ex-soldiers of Ingalls, Gray County, Kansas, praying for the passage of the bill to remove the limitations in the act granting arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TURPIE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 843) granting a pension to Thomas Todd, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5488) to increase the pension of Mary M. Gibson, widow of Commander William Gibson, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2555) to increase the pension of Mary M. Gibson, widow of Commander William Gibson, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 766) granting a pension to William Leslie and wife;

A bill (S. 574) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth M. Newman; and A bill (S. 851) granting a pension to James H. Preston.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1365) granting a pension to Annie E. Dixon, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 1672) granting a pension to Joseph Inboden; and

A bill (S. 1680) granting a pension to Catherine Kennedy, widow of Brian Kennedy, late private Company D, Tenth Regiment Ohio Volunteers.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 3177) granting a pension to Ursula Lucretia Haight;

A bill (S. 1546) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Sallie M. Michler, widow of the late Bvt. Brig. Gen. Nathaniel Michler, United States Army; and

A bill (H. R. 3636) granting a pension to William H. Brimmer.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2320) granting a pension to William H. Haight, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2861) for the relief of Helen E. Dewey, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 164) to refund moneys collected from William Schaus at the port of New York on an oil painting not subject to duty, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PADDOCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1303) granting a pension to Mrs. Amanda L. Wisner, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1302) granting a pension to John Bechen, sr., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 995) to increase the pension of Zachariah T. Crawford, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PADDOCK, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry I report back sundry petitions signed by numerous citizens of Nebraska and Kansas, praying for legislation to encourage the sugar industry. These petitions were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and from that committee recently I reported to the Senate a bill on this subject, which was referred to the Committee on Finance. I ask that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry be discharged from the further consideration of these petitions, and that they be referred to the Committee on Finance, to accompany the bill.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. MOODY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2976) granting a pension to Mary L. Bradley, formerly Mary L. Smith, who served as a nurse in the war of the rebellion, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2508) to reclassify and fix the salaries of persons in the railway mail service, known as railway postal clerks, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORRILL introduced a bill (S. 3256) to establish an educational fund, and apply the proceeds of the public lands and a portion of the receipts of certain land-grant railroad companies to public education and the more complete endowment and support of colleges for the advancement of scientific and industrial education; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. FARWELL introduced a bill (S. 3257) granting a pension to Mary Crook, widow of George Crook, late a major-general United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3258) granting a pension to Adaline L. Miller; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FAULKNER introduced a bill (S. 3259) granting a pension to Joseph Depoy; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TURPIE (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3260) for the relief of the heirs of Dr. John H. Long; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BLACKBURN introduced a bill (S. 3261) for the relief of Maj. G. C. Goodloe, paymaster of the United States Marine Corps; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 3262) to amend an act approved February 28, 1887, entitled "An act relating to the importing and landing of mackerel, etc.;" which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HOAR. I will state that this is a substitute for the bill which I introduced a day or two ago, containing a little better description of the territory to which it relates. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Fisheries.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT introduced a bill (S. 3263) for the relief of Lewis G. La Tour; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3264) granting a pension to Sarah Ann Noe; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3265) to authorize the extension of the Columbia Railway Company of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3266) for the relief of Eliza J. Bell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, introduced a bill (S. 3267) granting a pension to Thomas H. Hart; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAVIS introduced a bill (S. 3268) to amend sections 4783 and 5486 of the Revised Statutes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 3269) for the relief of the administratrix of the estate of George W. Lawrence; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3270) for the relief of the administratrix of the estate of George W. Lawrence; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 66) authorizing Commander Dennis W. Mullan, United States Navy, to accept a medal presented to him by the Chilean Government; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. GORMAN. In this connection I present the correspondence in relation to this affair, as well as a copy of a joint resolution passed by the General Assembly of Maryland, in which they have taken action for the purpose of getting this man a testimonial of their appreciation; and I move that the papers may be printed in the usual form as a document for the use of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 67) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask that the joint resolution be read at length and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as a part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE XVI.

The Congress shall have power concurrent with the several States to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to suppress combinations in restraint of trade and production, and to prevent transactions which create a monopoly or increase or depress the price of commodities which are or may become subjects of commerce among the States or with foreign nations.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. SPOONER, it was Ordered, That Nicholas T. Lawrence have leave to withdraw his papers from the files of the Senate.

DISTRICT SCHOOL BUILDINGS.

Mr. FAULKNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia are requested to inform the Senate whether the new eight-room school buildings, which have been constructed, or now in process of construction, under the last appropriation for that purpose, have been or are being so constructed as to render them as nearly fire-proof as possible, and, if not, what additional appropriation would be required to render said buildings already constructed or in process of construction fire-proof.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 525) to establish two additional land offices in the State of Montana.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 1296) for the relief of the owners, officers, and crew of the British bark Chance; and

A bill (H. R. 6099) granting an increase of pension to Elmer A. Snow.

ALASKA SEAL FISHERIES.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent to call up Order of Business 709, being Senate bill 3025, as it is rather important that the bill should be passed at once. I will send to the desk to have read a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury showing the necessity for immediate action on the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3025) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to gather full and authentic information as to the present condition and preservation of the fur-seal interests of the Government in the region of Alaska, as compared with its condition in 1870; also, full information as to the impending extinction of the sea-otter industry, and kindred lines of inquiry, etc.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment, in line 18, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twelve" and insert "ten;" so as to read:

Such agent to receive as compensation the sum of $10 per day while actually thus employed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I have a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, directed to the Committee on Ways and Means, and as this letter is quite full I ask to have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., March 13, 1890.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 11th instant, inclosing House bill 7903, "to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to gather full and authentic information as to the present condition of the fur-seal and sea-otter interests of the Government in Alaska," etc., for such suggestions as I deem appropriate.

Under the provisions of a similar act (approved April 22, 1874) the Secretary of the Treasury was enabled to procure a detailed and authoritative statement and survey of the real condition of those valuable fur-seal preserves of our Government as they then existed. This monograph, prepared and published by the Treasury Department under these auspices, has been the unquestioned authority and basis for all estimates and comparisons touching the conduct of affairs in the seal islands ever since, and has been extensively republished by the United States Fish Commission and the Tenth Census, United States of America.

But since then, and especially during the last four years, an unlooked-for and positive danger to these interests has arisen and seriously threatens their well-being and perpetuation. I refer to the great injury which the illegal killing of fur-seals in the open waters of Behring Sea has inflicted upon the "breeding" and "hauling" herds of fur-seals that annually repair to the Fribylov Islands. I deem it of the utmost importance that the Treasury Department shall have at the earliest hour an authoritative survey and statement, prepared from field observations by one who is fully qualified, of the exact condition and number of our fur-seal herds as they shall appear next summer on their accustomed breeding grounds in Behring Sea. Such a survey, contrasted with the survey made under the act of 1874, will show clearly the full extent of that damage done to these interests by pelagic poachers, and throw more light on the very important question as to the number of fur-seals that can be safely killed on the seal islands next year and thereafter; also, an investigation made personally in these waters into the methods of the poachers will furnish additional data upon which the Secretary of the Treasury can devise an efficient and economical means of suppressing this illegal and destructive business of pelagic sealing.

Also, in this connection arises the query as to what can be done to prevent the impending swift extinction of the sea-otter; for, upon the successful chase of this animal, some 5,000 civilized Aleuts and creoles of Alaska are wholly dependent for their means of support in a state above abject poverty and barbarism. I desire very much the fullest information touching this important question at the earliest moment, so that if any remedy can be applied it may be done promptly, and thus save an interesting people from untold hardship and probably the public Treasury from humane demand in the way of feeding and clothing an impoverished community that would have continued self-supporting if properly protected.

To secure this information a fully qualified expert can be employed under the terms of the inclosed bill; he can, by its provisions, travel so as to cover the whole field of inquiry. The Treasury agents now stationed on the seal islands are confined by law to a daily supervision of the operations of the lessees and a personal attendance on the killing grounds during the sealing season; they can not be spared from this duty, nor should they be, even if they were competent to make this special investigation. For these reasons I am in favor of the passage of this bill.

Respectfully, yours,

GEO. S. BATCHELLER,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. N. DINGLEY,
Chairman Subcommittee Ways and Means, House of Representatives.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Shall the bill pass?

Mr. GORMAN. I only desire to say, sir, that I take it there is no use in making any opposition to this bill, but it does seem to me that it is simply creating more useless offices with the officers of the revenue marine, who are directly under the Secretary of the Treasury, and with the special agents who have been sent to Alaska for the purpose of making examination and reporting all the facts to the Secretary. Such reports have been made and a new lease has just been made; and I had hoped that we should pass along without further expenditure for additional officials. I simply want to say that I shall content myself by voting against the bill.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I wish to say in reply to the Senator from Maryland that when the first lease was made precisely this bill passed Congress for the very purpose of ascertaining the condition of things on those islands, so as to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to regulate the lessees themselves and control them. It seems highly proper that when a new lease is made the condition in which the old lessees leave the islands should be ascertained clearly, and that the needs of the people there should be made known in such a way as to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to regulate the conduct of the lessees. That can not be done by those particular agents who are sent out there to watch the operations of the lessees, because they are required to be on the ground and see every seal skin that is taken off and take account of them, and they can do nothing about locating these islands. It is said that they have changed their position and changed their character and changed their boundaries. Under the former act, twenty years ago, those boundaries were all marked out and the survey which was made under the act of which this is a copy has been the guide for the last twenty years. It is impossible for the agent to do this who is sent out there to keep account of the work of the lessees.

The idea that when we are about to receive a million dollars a year from these seals we can not expend, say, $1,200 for the payment of a man who will go out there and have nothing else to do in the next six or eight months but to bring back here reliable information as to the topography, as to the climate, as to the condition the late lessees have left the people and the islands and the seals in, it seems to me could hardly bear an argument.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, this is a very small appropriation considering the vast amount of revenue that is to be derived by the Government. We have recently leased the seal islands at a greatly enlarged rental from that paid heretofore under the lease, and it is supposed by many that the number of seals annually frequenting those islands is less now by at least two million a year. It is very important that the Secretary of the Treasury should know how to limit the amount, and the survey which is to be made by this agent will give that information to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, I understand a contract has been recently made with a company which proposes to give a much larger price for the privilege of the seal fisheries than the former company. They propose to give $10 apiece for the seals caught, and the former company gave only $3 heretofore. Is that correct?

Mr. MORRILL. Not quite. It was a little over $3.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, a contract was made, but somehow or other, notwithstanding the discussion we have had here, I do not understand that it was ever questioned how it was kept after the Secretary of the Treasury relieved the contractors from what are considered the burdens of their contract. Now, a more onerous contract is made. Will the result of the passage of this bill and the investigation thereunder be a recommendation to the Secretary of the Treasury that on account of the reduction of profits in the seal fishery the contract must be modified, its terms reduced as to the lessees? The contract fixes the terms by which they are to be governed. The agents, as suggested by the Senator from Maryland, who are on the ground there are looking out for the seal fisheries. The Government furnishes its revenue-cutters for the purpose of general inspection and general observation, as I understand, at these fisheries, and it seems to me a matter of very questionable propriety to provide for the appointment of a new commissioner or agent for the purpose of making these investigations.

I have further to say that I do not know how far I ought to go in suggesting that possibly this new commissioner or agent might be subject to temptation. I doubt the propriety of leaving such a report to the discretion of an individual man. If a commission is necessary to be appointed at all let it consist of more than one person. We know that where great corporations are concerned, where their interests are involved, they not infrequently manage to use influences over the minds of persons with whom they deal. I should rather risk the chances with two commissioners, where so much responsibility exists, than with one, if there is to be a commission at all.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I objected to this bill for the reason that I supposed that under the general law the Secretary of the Treasury had at his command, not only the officers of the revenue marine, capable men who have been stationed there and have been examining and looking into this question, but he has unquestionably in the Treasury Department a corps of men whom he can increase at his will and pleasure, known as the special agents, whom he can detail for this very duty. It is well known to everybody that during past years the Secretary of the Treasury has detailed gentlemen from the special service to make this examination, and it is as well known as we know anything that possibly the best, the most astute, the most intelligent man who has been sent to that region to examine it made a report to the Secretary of the Treasury; since when a new contract has been made with another firm or company at more favorable rates to the Government. We are informed by the newspapers that one of the Treasury agents has since become an officer or an agent of the new company. I know personally nothing of this affair, nothing except what I gather from the public prints. I do not intend to reflect on the conduct of any such officer. I do suggest that if there is to be an inquiry made under special legislation, it ought to be, in view of what has just occurred, made by a commission higher than the one that is proposed here, one whose report will meet with approval by the country. To simply send out another agent, creating an office specially for this purpose, when the Secretary has power to send such an officer already in the service, is, I think, unwise. This constant multiplication of officers is objectionable, and it does seem to me (I make the suggestion with all deference) that if the question is to be again looked into it ought to be by a commission.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know what the intention of the Secretary of the Treasury may be under this bill. I do not know exactly whether the Senator from Maryland intends by his remarks to reflect upon the agent who went out under the old bill twenty years ago, nor do I know who this particular agent is who has gone into the employ of this new company. If any agent of the Treasury has done that thing, of course it unfits him for this service. The agent who went out under the other law, which was a bill introduced by myself twenty years ago, made a report which has been the guide for twenty years of the whole Treasury Department. His report has gone into the census as a monograph upon the subject of the seal fishery. I have never heard until this moment—and I do not know that the Senator intended to reflect upon that report or upon that gentleman; I agree with the Senator—

Mr. SHERMAN. The person alluded to by the Senator from Maryland is not the one the Senator from Massachusetts refers to. The one is Mr. Elliott and the other is Mr. McIntyre.

Mr. GORMAN. I had no reference to the gentleman who made the original report. What I stated was what I have seen in the newspapers, for I have no access to the Departments, that an agent of the Treasury Department who has been there within the last four or five years, perhaps sent there by the last Administration, or, at all events, who has been there within the last three or four years watching the interests of the Government and making reports upon the conduct of the old company, immediately after the new contract was made became an officer of the new company.

Now, as I understand it, he was simply one of the special agents of the Treasury Department. I suggest that, if we are to legislate at all, we ought to appoint a commission with higher authority than a mere agent such as is provided for by this bill.

Mr. DAWES. That shows the impropriety of relegating this service to the agents sent out under the existing law, which was the Senator's first suggestion when he took the floor the first time. I agree with the Senator that it is the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to employ the best possible talent for this service. The importance of the revenue justifies it, the importance of the whole work justifies it, but, more than all that, I failed to make the slightest impression upon anybody else in respect to it the other day when we discussed the seal matter; but what impresses me all the time is the effect upon the future of Alaska. For forty years, taking the twenty years that are passed and the twenty years that are to come, the whole fate and development of all Alaska is put under the control of private enterprise. That control has been exercised in the past as well as it could possibly be, for aught I know, and I have no reason to suspect that it will not be in the future. But it is a serious question with reference to what seem to me to be the possibilities of Alaska in the future, whether it should be entirely under the control of a private enterprise, however well conducted that enterprise may be. Now, here is possibly some means of alleviating that which seems at present to be a necessary evil, some means of bringing to the knowledge of the administrator of this great work information on the subject-matter, if he can get it in no other way. Are we to presume that he will not employ the best possible talent for the end? If so, he will not have done his duty. I have no doubt he will do that. If he does not do it, he does not do his duty.

Mr. FAULKNER. In reference to the allusion made by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] to the gentleman to whom I understand he has referred, Mr. George Tingle, I desire to state that he was formerly a citizen of my State and subsequently a citizen of Montana. I know him well. The Senator is laboring under a misapprehension as to the facts when he connects Mr. Tingle, while in the Government service, with a subsequent employment by the company which has the lease of these islands. He was employed in the Government service for some time. He subsequently left that service and became a citizen of Montana, and during the present winter, after his entire connection with the Government service had ceased, he was employed by gentlemen who compose the company and who had leased these islands as one of their employes. I am satisfied from my knowledge of that gentleman's character that nothing could have occurred by reason of his conduct in connection with this subject to justify any criticism as to his employment. I think it is but just to him that this should be stated to the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to state that I happen to know the person who will probably be selected. He is an employe of the Smithsonian Institution, and there is no man in this country who is better qualified to discharge the duties that will be imposed upon him than the selection which will be made by the Secretary of the Treasury, and he is as much above being bought off by any company as any member of the Senate on this floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed; there being on a division—ayes 25, noes 17.

LA ABRA SILVER MINING COMPANY.

Mr. VEST submitted the following resolution, and asked for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not in his opinion incompatible with the interests of the public service, copies of all correspondence between the La Abra Silver Mining Company or its officers, attorneys, or counsel, or any of them, and the Department of State or President of the United States, and also between the said Department and the Mexican Government since the publication of the last executive document touching the award rendered in favor of the said company by the United States and Mexican Claims Commission or the distribution of the moneys paid on account of the said award by the Mexican Government.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. DOLPH. Who offered the resolution?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to have it read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read again.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. DOLPH. I have no objection to the resolution now. As I understand, it calls for all documents since the last publication.

The resolution was agreed to.

LAND IN SEVERALTY TO INDIANS.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to communicate to the Senate the number of patents issued up to date to Indians under the severalty act, and on what reservations, in detail, and what number of allotments, if any, now await patent.

SENATORS FROM MONTANA.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to give a notice which it may be convenient to the Senate to have given now. I gave notice yesterday that I should call up the Montana election case for action on Thursday, the day after to-morrow; but I have been informed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], who is a member of the committee, that it will be more convenient to him and some other members of the minority to have a short postponement of the case. Therefore I shall defer calling it up until next Monday.

TRUSTS AND COMBINATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further morning business, the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe it is necessary to submit a motion in order to take up the unfinished business now, it being before 2 o'clock, and I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the trust bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1) to declare unlawful trusts and combinations in restraint of trade and production.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. STEWART. Let the amendment be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as additional sections the following:

SEC. 3. That all persons engaged in the creation of any trust, or as owner or part owner, agent, or manager of any trust, employed in any business carried on with any foreign country, or between the States, or between any State and the District of Columbia, or between any State and any Territory of the United States, or any owner or part owner, agent, or manager of any corporation, company, or person employed in any such business, using its powers for either of the purposes specified in the second section of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $10,000 or imprisonment at hard labor in the penitentiary not exceeding five years, or by both of said penalties, in the discretion of the court trying the same.

SEC. 4. That a trust is a combination of capital, skill, or acts by two or more persons, firms, or associations of persons, or of any two or more of them, for either, any, or all of the following purposes:

First. To create or carry out any restrictions in trade.

Second. To limit or reduce the production or to increase or reduce the price of merchandise or commodities.

Third. To prevent competition in the manufacture, making, purchase, sale, or transportation of merchandise, produce, or commodities.

Fourth. To fix a standard or figure whereby the price to the public shall be in any manner controlled or established of any article, commodity, merchandise, produce, or commerce intended for sale, use, or consumption.

Fifth. To create a monopoly in the making, manufacture, purchase, sale, or transportation of any merchandise, article, produce, or commodity.

Sixth. To make, or enter into, or execute, or carry out any contract, obligation, or agreement of any kind or description by which they shall bind, or shall have bound themselves not to manufacture, sell, dispose of, or transport any article or commodity or article of trade, use, merchandise, or consumption below a common standard figure, or by which they shall agree in any manner to keep the price of such article, commodity, or transportation at a fixed or graduated figure, or by which they shall in any manner establish or settle the price of any article, commodity, or transportation between themselves, or between themselves and others so as to preclude free and unrestricted competition among themselves and others in the sale and transportation of any such article or commodity, or by which they shall agree to pool, combine, or unite in any interest they may have in connection with the sale or transportation of any such article or commodity that its price may in any manner be so affected.

SEC. 5. That each day any of the persons, associations, or corporations aforesaid shall be engaged in violating the provisions of this act shall be held to be a separate offense.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the wish has been expressed in my hearing by several Senators that this bill and the various amendments which have been offered to it and which are proposed to be offered shall be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I concur in the propriety of that course. I shall make that motion and do now make it, and on that I ask the indulgence of the Senate to state some reasons why that course should be pursued.

Certainly there is no subject likely to engage the attention of the present Congress in which the people of this country are more deeply interested than in the subject of trusts and combinations. These evils have grown within the last few years to an enormous magnitude; enormous also in their numbers. They cover nearly all the great branches of trade and of production in which our country is interested. They grow out of the present tendency of economic affairs throughout the world. It is a sad thought to the philanthropist that the present system of production and of exchange is having that tendency which is sure at some not very distant day to crush out all small men, all small capitalists, all small enterprises. This is being done now. We find everywhere over our land the wrecks of small, independent enterprises thrown in our pathway. So now the American Congress and the American people are brought face to face with this sad, this great problem: Is production, is trade, to be taken away from the great mass of the people and concentrated in the hands of a few men who, I am obliged to add, by the policies pursued by our Government, have been enabled to aggregate to themselves large, enormous fortunes?

This is the evil before us. Any time within the last nine years since I have had the honor to be a member of this body I would have introduced a bill to prevent these evils, to suppress these combinations and these trusts if I could have found the constitutional power to enact the bill. I find myself to-day, with every wish to exercise every power conferred by the Constitution upon Congress to suppress these trusts, unable to find in that instrument a power under which the Senate can originate a measure that in my opinion will be efficient.

The people complain; the people suffer; the people in many parts of our country, especially the agricultural people, are in greater distress than they have ever been before. They look with longing eyes, they turn their faces to us with pleading hands asking us to do something to relieve them from their trouble. I believe the sentiment that something ought to be done pervades this body almost universally. The question for us and the problem for us is how, consistently with the limited powers which the Constitution has conferred upon us, we can deal with these great evils.

There is a power, a power which the learned and distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] on the 14th day of September, 1888, declared in this body was the only power which could be efficiently used. That is the taxing power. But by the forms of our Constitution no tax law, no bill to raise revenue can originate in this body. But for that the amendment offered to this bill by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] would receive and ought to receive the vote of every member of this body. We can go further. In that amendment the taxing power is applied to options and to futures. There is no reason why this same power could not be applied as it was applied for the purpose of suppressing the circulation of State bank notes, to the suppression of these trusts, the suppression of these combinations which are eating up the substance of our people. But, sir, we can not originate that in this body; a revenue bill must be first sent to us from the other House before we can enter into that business. The Senate, however, seems determined, leaving out the taxing power, to pass some measure on this very intricate and very difficult subject.

I say it is difficult and intricate, and if the Senate will bear with me while I call attention to the several bills which have been introduced by the Senator from Ohio partly on his own account and partly as the organ of the Committee on Finance, the Senate will see what difficulties that Senator and the great committee of which he is the organ have encountered in the pursuit of this subject.

On the 14th day of August, 1888, the Senator from Ohio introduced a bill. I desire all these bills to be printed as a part of my remarks. I do not wish to read them all, and I shall ask that the Reporter will note at this point the bill to be inserted.

The bill referred to is as follows:

A bill to declare unlawful trusts and combinations in restraint of trade and production.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between persons or corporations made with a view or which tend to prevent full and free competition in the production, manufacture, or sale of articles of domestic growth or production, or of the sale of articles imported into the United States, and all arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between persons or corporations designed or which tend to advance the cost to the consumer of any such articles are hereby declared to be against public policy, unlawful, and void; and any person or corporation injured or damaged by such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination may sue for and recover in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction double the amount of damages suffered by such person or corporation. And any corporation doing business within the United States that acquires or takes part in any such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination shall forfeit its corporate franchise; and it shall be the duty of the district attorney of the United States of the district in which such corporation exists or does business to institute the proper proceedings to enforce such forfeiture.

Mr. GEORGE. This was the first bill that was introduced in the Senate on this subject. In that the Senator from Ohio assumed, as the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] did yesterday, that Congress had full, complete jurisdiction over the subject of trusts and combinations, whether they affect interstate or foreign commerce or not. It will be seen by reading the bill that it denounced all arrangements, contracts, agreements, and trusts made by anybody about anything which is an article of commerce, whether in domestic, interstate, or foreign commerce.

Mr. REAGAN. Is the Senator from Mississippi sure that is the first bill introduced on that subject?

Mr. GEORGE. That is the first one introduced here that I know of. Mr. REAGAN. I introduced one the same day, or previously to that time, on the same subject.

Mr. GEORGE. I stand corrected upon that. I have been pursuing in most of my investigations the action of the Senator from Ohio and the committee of which he is the organ.

That bill had no reference to transactions in interstate or foreign commerce, but assuming that the Congress of the United States had throughout the Union, as a separate State has within its own borders, full and complete jurisdiction over the subject of trusts it legislated in that way. It applied to contracts made by anybody; it applied to all subjects of commerce, interstate, foreign, and domestic; and it contained the remarkable provision that Congress could enact a law declaring the ground of forfeiture for a State corporation of its charter and directing proceedings in a Federal court by a Federal officer against a State corporation for the purpose of declaring the forfeiture of its charter. That was the first bill introduced by the Senator. That was introduced August 14, 1888.

The Committee on Finance kept the bill under consideration until September 11, nearly one month, and then we have bill No. 2, which the Reporter will note.

The bill reported September 11, 1888, is as follows:

That all arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between persons or corporations made with a view, or which tend, to prevent full and free competition in the importation, transportation, or sale of articles imported into the United States, or in the production, manufacture, or sale of articles of domestic growth or production, or domestic raw material that competes with any similar article upon which a duty is levied by the United States, or which shall be transported from one State or Territory to another, and all arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between persons or corporations designed, or which tend, to advance the cost to the consumer of any such articles, are hereby declared to be against public policy, unlawful, and void.

Sec. 2. That any person or corporation injured or damaged by such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination may sue for and recover in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, of any person or corporation a party to a combination described in the first section of this act, the full consideration or sum paid by him for any goods, wares, and merchandise included in or advanced in price by said combination.

Sec. 3. That all persons entering into any such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination described in section 1 of this act, either on his own account or as agent or attorney for another, or as an officer, agent, or stockholder of any corporation, or as a trustee, committee, or in any capacity whatever, shall be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof in any district or circuit court of the United States shall be subject to a fine of not more than $10,000 or to imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not more than five years, or to both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. And it shall be the duty of the district attorney of the United States of the district in which such persons reside to institute the proper proceedings to enforce the provisions of this act.

Mr. GEORGE. By that bill all of the first bill was stricken out and the committee sought to get jurisdiction upon a ground which I will now proceed to state. The committee began to discover that this subject of trusts and combinations in restraint of trade was not a matter of Federal jurisdiction in its full extent. They began to discover that they must look to some particular power granted by the Constitution to Congress under which they could pass this bill. So they undertook and so they provided that these arrangements and contracts should be in reference to preventing "full and free competition in the importation, transportation, or sale of articles imported into the United States, or in the production, manufacture, or sale of articles of domestic growth or production, or domestic raw material that competes with any similar article" introduced into the United States "or which shall be transported from one State or Territory to another."

The committee sought jurisdiction upon the ground that these trusts were interfering with full and free competition with articles imported which were dutiable articles. The idea of the committee seemed to be this: If Congress can impose a duty upon a foreign article, Congress may prevent an arrangement or a trust which interferes with the sale of that imported article. That was the first ground. The second ground was that if these arrangements were made about articles which were afterwards transported in interstate commerce that would bring them within Federal jurisdiction.

At this stage there was some discussion in this body, in which cases were cited and principles of constitutional law well known were introduced and brought to the attention of the Senate, which showed the utter fallacy of the grounds upon which the committee had placed the jurisdiction of Congress to enact the bill. Some discussion followed and some amendments were made, so that on the 25th of January, 1889, there was another bill reported from the committee. That is bill No. 3.

The bill referred to is as follows:

A bill to declare unlawful trusts and combinations in restraint of trade and production.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between persons or corporations made with a view or which tend to prevent full and free competition in the importation, transportation, or sale of articles imported into the United States, or in the production, manufacture, or sale of articles of domestic growth or production, or domestic raw material that in due course of trade shall be transported from one State or Territory to another, or to the District of Columbia, or from the District of Co- lumbia to any State or Territory, and all arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts or combinations between persons or corporations designed or which tend to advance the cost to the consumer of any of such articles are hereby declared to be against public policy, unlawful, and void.

SEC. 2. That any person or corporation injured or damaged by such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination may sue for and recover in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, of any person or corporation a party to a combination described in the first section of this act, the full consideration or sum paid by him for any goods, wares, and merchandise included in or advanced in price by said combination.

SEC. 3. That if one of the purposes of any such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination shall be to compel any person, partnership, or corporation to become a party thereto, or to cease from doing any lawful business, or to sell and dispose of any lawful business, or if acts shall be done under any such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination, which have for their purpose, or which shall tend to compel the giving up or sale of any lawful business, the person, partnership, or corporation injured thereby may sue for and recover in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction the damages sustained thereby of any person or corporation a party to any such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination, or of all or any number less than all of such parties. And if any purchaser of articles specified in the preceding section shall be put to additional cost by the advancing of the price of such articles by means or because of any such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination, he may, in like manner, sue for and recover the damages sustained, which shall in such case be estimated at the full consideration or sum paid by him for the articles so advanced in price as aforesaid.

SEC. 4. That all persons entering into any such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination described in section 1 of this act, either on his own account or as agent or attorney for another, or as an officer, agent, or stockholder of any corporation, or as a trustee, committee, or in any capacity whatever, shall be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof in any district or circuit court of the United States, shall be subject to a fine of not more than $10,000 or to imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not more than five years, or to both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. And it shall be the duty of the district attorney of the United States of the district in which such persons reside to institute the proper proceedings to enforce the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. That any person who, ninety days after the passage of this law, shall act as a manager, officer, trustee, or agent of any arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination as described in the first section, shall be liable to the penalties prescribed in the fourth section.

Mr. GEORGE. In that bill, either by the acceptance of the Senator from Ohio or by the vote of the Senate—and I do not remember which—section 3 and section 5 were introduced for the first time in this legislation.

Mr. SHERMAN. What bill is that?

Mr. GEORGE. This is Senate bill 3445, ordered to be printed January 25, 1889. I will read section 3 so that the Senator can catch my idea more perfectly. I believe this section was offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. At all events it appears to be ordered reprinted as amended. In section 3 of this bill it was proposed—

That if one of the purposes of any such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination shall be to compel any person, partnership, or corporation to become a party thereto, or to cease from doing any lawful business, or to sell and dispose of any lawful business, or if acts shall be done under any such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination, which have for their purpose or which shall tend to compel the giving up or sale of any lawful business, the person, partnership, or corporation injured thereby may sue for and recover in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction the damages sustained thereby of any person or corporation a party to any such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination, or of all or any number less than all of such parties.

And then there was a provision in that same section for recovering further damages. The fifth section was intended to have operation upon trusts and combinations already formed, and is in the following words:

That any person who, ninety days after the passage of this law, shall act as manager, officer, trustee, or agent of any arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination as described in the first section, shall be liable to the penalties prescribed in the fourth section.

In that connection there was also some discussion. It was shown in that debate very fully that under the power to regulate foreign and interstate commerce the provisions of the bill could not stand. It was also shown that the bill covered very innocent combinations and transactions, such as the alliances among farmers and grangers and combinations among laborers to advance their wages, etc. That bill submitted on the 25th day of January, 1889, after that debate was closed, was never called up for action during the last Congress.

That disposes, Mr. President, of the history of this legislation or attempted legislation in the Fiftieth Congress. But the Senator from Ohio was not disposed, as he understood his duty, to let the matter rest there; so that on the first day or the next day after we met at this session, at least on December 4—I believe we met on the 2d—the Senator from Ohio introduced this bill:

Be it enacted, etc., That all arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between persons or corporations made with a view or which tend to prevent full and free competition in the importation, transportation, or sale of articles imported into the United States, or in the production, manufacture, or sale of articles of domestic growth or production, or domestic raw material that competes with any similar article upon which a duty is levied by the United States, or which shall be transported from one State or Territory to another, and all arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between persons or corporations designed or which tend to advance the cost to the consumer of any such articles, are hereby declared to be against public policy, unlawful, and void.

SEC. 2. That any person or corporation injured or damaged by such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination may sue for and recover, in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, of any person or corporation a party to a combination described in the first section of this act, the full consideration or sum paid by him for any goods, wares, and merchandise included in or advanced in price by said combination.

SEC. 3. That all persons entering into any such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination described in section 1 of this act, either on his own account or as agent or attorney for another, or as an officer, agent, or stockholder of any corporation, or as a trustee, committee, or in any capacity whatever, shall be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof in any district or circuit court of the United States shall be subject to a fine of not more than $10,000 or to imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not more than five years, or to both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. And it shall be the duty of the district attorney of the United States of the district in which such persons reside to institute the proper proceedings to enforce the provisions of this act.

In this the effort was made to evade—I suppose I ought not to use the word “evade,” as that is sometimes used in a sinister sense, and I do not use it in that sense—but an effort was made to get rid of the constitutional objections which had been urged in the last Congress; so that we have here some provisions which had been left out of No. 3.

The committee seem to have been uncertain about the ground upon which they had placed it. In No. 2, the second bill introduced, one of the grounds of jurisdiction was stated in these words: The article must “compete with any similar article upon which a duty is levied by the United States.” That was left out of the next bill. The committee thought they could get along with the jurisdiction without this competing clause, and so with that omission the Senator from Ohio, in the original bill introduced at this session, presented the bill in other respects substantially like the last bill that had been reported in the last Congress, except that section 3 and section 5 which I have read were omitted.

That went to the committee, and on the 14th of January, 1890, it was reported back to the Senate with some changes with the view of getting at jurisdiction. It had been shown in the debate, and conclusively shown by citations from the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, that articles which might become subjects of interstate commerce did not so become until they were actually delivered at the depot of the common carrier for transportation. Several cases were cited which settled that doctrine beyond dispute. So when the Committee on Finance, able and learned as it, came to consider the bill introduced by the Senator from Ohio on the second day of the session, they discovered that the bill would not stand the constitutional test, and so they changed the bill in the particulars to which I will now call the attention of the Senate.

The bill reported January 14, 1890, is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between persons or corporations made with the intention to prevent full and free competition in the importation, transportation, or sale of articles imported into the United States, or in the production, manufacture, or sale of articles of domestic growth or production, or domestic raw material that competes with any similar article upon which a duty is levied by the United States, intended for and which shall be transported from one State or Territory to another for sale, and all such arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between persons or corporations intended to advance the cost to the consumer of any such articles are hereby declared to be against public policy, unlawful, and void.

SEC. 2. That any person or corporation injured or damaged by such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination may sue for and recover, in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, of any person or corporation a party to a combination described in the first section of this act, twice the amount of the damages sustained, and the costs of suit.

SEC. 3. That all persons entering into any such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination described in section 1 of this act, either on his own account or as agent or attorney for another, or as an officer, agent, or stockholder of any corporation, or as a trustee, committee, or in any capacity whatever, shall be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof in any district or circuit court of the United States shall be subject to a fine of not more than $10,000 or to imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not more than five years, or to both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. And it shall be the duty of the district attorney of the United States of the district in which such persons reside to institute the proper proceedings to enforce the provisions of this act.

As the bill originally read it stood as follows:

That all arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between persons or corporations made with a view or which tend to prevent full and free competition.

The committee struck out the words “a view or which tend” and inserted the words “the intention;” so that the bill read in this way:

That all such arrangements, etc., made with the intention to prevent full and free competition.

And then in order to meet the objection which has been made, based upon the decision in Coe vs. Errol, in 116 United States Reports, the committee inserted in that part of the bill which referred to the transportation of these goods the words “intended for;” so that that part of the bill read in this way: That these arrangements and contracts made “to prevent full and free competition in the” goods above described, which goods are “intended for and which shall be transported from one State or Territory to another for sale,” and then in the general clause which condemns all sorts of arrangements and trusts between persons or corporations to advance the cost to the consumer, the committee again struck out the words “designed, or which tend” and inserted the word “intended.” So the effort of the committee in this bill was to get jurisdiction under the commercial clause upon the ground that the articles about which the arrangement was made, about which the trust was formed, were intended for and afterwards transported in interstate commerce.

In that condition the bill stood on the 17th day of last month when it was called up for discussion in this Chamber, and was discussed by myself. I claim that the debate showed, not by force of the argument of the speaker, but by the citation of cases decided by the Supreme Court, that the words “intended for transportation in interstate commerce" gave no additional power to Congress. That argument has never been answered. I believe I might say it has never been attempted to be answered. I feel authorized to say that it can not be answered because every position taken was based upon a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

With that array of authority it was supposed by some that this controversy was at an end, and yet in that we were mistaken, for on the 18th day of March, 1890, we had the bill in its present shape, as thus reported by the Senator from Ohio:

That all arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between two or more citizens or corporations, or both, of different States, or between two or more citizens or corporations, or both, of the United States and foreign States, or citizens or corporations thereof, made with a view or which tend to prevent full and free competition in the importation, transportation, or sale of articles imported into the United States; or with a view or which tend to prevent full and free competition in articles of growth, production, or manufacture of any State or Territory of the United States with similar articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of any other State or Territory, or in the transportation or sale of like articles the production of any State or Territory of the United States into or within any other State or Territory of the United States; and all arrangements, trusts, or combinations between such citizens or corporations, made with a view or which tend to advance the cost to the consumer of any such articles, are hereby declared to be against public policy, unlawful, and void. And the circuit court of the United States shall have original jurisdiction of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity arising under this section, and to issue all remedial process, orders, or writs proper and necessary to enforce its provisions. And the Attorney-General and the several district attorneys are hereby directed, in the name of the United States, to commence and prosecute all such cases to final judgment and execution.

SEC. 2. That any person or corporation injured or damaged by such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination defined in the first section of this act may sue for and recover, in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, without respect to the amount involved, of any person or corporation a party to a combination described in the first section of this act, twice the amount of damages sustained and the costs of the suit, together with a reasonable attorney's fee.

In the first bill the jurisdiction was claimed to be absolute, plenary, and original, not dependent upon the commerce clause of the Constitution. In the four subsequent ones the committee undertook to get jurisdiction from the commerce clause of the Constitution. In all these efforts the committee have been defeated, and now we have this bill based upon the extraordinary proposition, the unparalleled proposition that, because the Constitution has granted to the courts of the United States jurisdiction in controversies between citizens of different States and between citizens of the United States and of foreign countries, therefore the Constitution has granted to Congress legislative power to regulate the transactions between citizens of different States and between citizens of the United States and of foreign countries.

A judicial power, it is unnecessary for me to state, I hope, in this body, is a power jus dicere, a power to say what the law is. A legislative power is a power jus dare, a power to say what the law shall be. The judicial power ascertains the existing law and applies it to transactions occurring; the legislative power makes new rules, new regulations for transactions thereafter to occur. Yet strange as it may seem, because the Constitution gave a judicial power to settle controversies between citizens of different States and between citizens of the United States and of foreign countries, the bill is formulated to legislate to make rules and regulations concerning these transactions.

I am not going into that argument any further at present. I shall do it, though, unless my motion prevails. I have only gone thus far to show to the Senate the difficulty which the Committee on Finance have encountered in framing this bill. I have pointed out the differences between the various bills to show that all along for now more than a year the committee have not been able to find a single solid stone in the Constitution upon which it could place this bill, but as often as it has been discussed, as often as the fallacies upon which one of these bills rests have been exposed, the committee, uncertain, doubtful, have sought refuge in another pretense. That is the meaning of the history which I have given this morning. The committee in no part of all these six bills which they have presented for the consideration of the Senate have ever been able to place the jurisdiction of Congress to enact them twice upon the same proposition. When beaten from one rampart behind which they have fortified themselves, they have fallen back and made another. Beaten out of that they have retreated to a third; beaten out of that they have retreated to a fourth, and so again to a fifth, and so again to this last ditch in which they place the jurisdiction of Congress on the extraordinary proposition to which I have called the attention of the Senate.

Mr. President, under these circumstances of doubt and difficulty, this changing attitude of the Committee on Finance, the immense importance of this question to the people of the United States, our grave and solemn duty which we owe to the people of the United States to do something, and something effectual, it becomes us to stop, to think, to deliberate. Are Senators willing, in face of this great demand of the people of the United States for redress against these enormous evils, to give to these crying and supplicating sufferers a mere sham? The people call to us for redress. They ask us for security against wrong and evil. Shall we, upon any idea that we will do something, that we will throw some sop to the dog Cerberus, pass a bill which will accomplish nothing, unless it be to demonstrate the inability or the unwillingness of the American Congress to pass an efficient measure?

In view of these things, Mr. President, I think I do a duty, I think I discharge a proper duty to the people of the United States when I ask the Senate to refer all these various propositions to that committee which by the rules of the Senate has charge of these great questions.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President—

Mr. MORGAN. Before the Senator from Texas proceeds, if he will allow me just a moment, I wish to ask the Senator from Mississippi whether he does not also desire to put some limitations upon the time within which the Committee on the Judiciary shall report a bill.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know. That is usual, but this is a grave matter and I should be willing, so far as I am concerned, that the committee be required to report in any reasonable time, say in two or three weeks.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, twenty days, say?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, twenty days, if that is proper. I dislike to make a proposition of that sort in the motion to commit.

Mr. MORGAN. In view of the pressure of business here, I will move an amendment to that effect, that the committee be required to report a bill within twenty days.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well; I do not object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOODY in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi to refer the bill and amendments to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. INGALLS. What was the motion of the Senator from Alabama? To amend?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the amendment to the motion has been accepted by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. No; the Senator from Alabama moves the amendment himself. I do not accept it, because I doubt the propriety of it.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the amendment to the motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi moves that the bill and pending amendments be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Senator from Alabama moves to amend by instructing the committee to report within twenty days. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, to limit the time within which the committee shall report. The Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, the honorable Senator who makes the motion to refer these bills to the Judiciary Committee is a member of that committee. He told us in his opening remarks this morning that for several years he had been endeavoring to formulate in his mind some bill that would give relief against the great evil to which he has referred growing out of unlawful trusts and combinations. He favored us a few weeks ago with a very learned and able argument to demonstrate that the bill reported by the Committee on Finance was not warranted by the Constitution. He is a member of a committee which has had a bill before it from the first day of this session of the Senate until now and has never acted upon it. I confess that it seems to me not very encouraging to refer bills of this description to that committee.

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator will allow me, I will state (I am not sure I am right about it, but I think I am) that one reason of the delay in the action of the Judiciary Committee upon the matter was that the subject was before the Committee on Finance.

Mr. REAGAN. But the honorable Senator has just told us that the Judiciary Committee is the right committee for this subject to be before, and it had a bill referred to it. I think that is an answer to his suggestion.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator allow me? I do not know that it is a matter which is very material, but the reason why the Judiciary Committee did not act upon this matter was on account of the sickness of the chairman of that committee. I am not a very experienced parliamentarian and never took much interest in that sort of business, but if it is within the rules for me to state what happened in committee, I wish to say that more than six weeks ago, two months ago, I moved myself, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, for the appointment of a subcommittee to take under consideration the subject of trusts, there being then pending before us the bill of the Senator from Texas and one other measure. I collated all the bills that had been offered in Congress, together with a large number that had been before the State Legislatures; but the sickness of the chairman of the committee delayed the matter until a few days ago. That subcommittee has now been appointed, and about the time that we commenced the consideration of this matter the bill coming from the Committee on Finance of which the Senator from Ohio has charge was called up in the Senate. Those are the facts, and it is but justice to the Judiciary Committee to state them.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to make a little additional statement? I suppose it is not a breach of any rule of this body to say that a very large number of nominations for important offices have been before that committee during the few months of the present session, marshals, district attorneys, judges for various States and Territories; and also, I suppose, it is matter of public notoriety that in regard to nearly all of those officials, from the importance of the offices and in some cases from questions of fact which were raised by Senators or by the public elsewhere, inquiries have had to be made into facts transpiring at a distance from the seat of Government, and the time at the command of that committee has been very much occupied and engrossed by that class of its duties.

Mr. REAGAN. I have no doubt that the Judiciary Committee has had a great deal of such labor before it, as is suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts. In connection with these explanations, I desire to read what the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said on that very point yesterday:

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is the substance and for aught I know now literally the body of the bill that he introduced, I see by the top of it, on the 4th day of December last, I think about the first day of the session, and which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I think it due to the Senator and to the Senate to state that according to our course the chairman very soon, almost immediately, referred that bill to a subcommittee of three among the most eminent and earnest of the members of that committee, but the committee has not yet been able to act upon it, owing, I have no doubt, to other important business in the committee, our time having been almost exclusively and necessarily devoted to the consideration of executive business. I think it is due to the Senator from Texas and to the Senate, he having introduced the bill so early, to say that.

I can understand very well, with the multiplied duties of the Judiciary Committee and with the difficulties which attend the formulation of a bill on this subject, that there may have been delay; and I do not complain of the delay, because the members of that committee were the better judges of what they were able to do than I can be, who was less informed as to what was before them. The point I made was this: The motion to refer comes from a member of the committee who confesses his inability to formulate a bill upon the subject and who combats, as far as I know, all the bills presented.

I can not state in as strong terms as the Senator from Mississippi has done the great need for legislation upon this subject, the demand of the public for legislation upon this subject, the importance and necessity of legislation upon this subject; and is it possible that the Senate of the United States, having this subject before it in the last Congress and the present, has not been able to reach a conclusion that it could act or that it could not act, and to state the reasons why it could act or why it could not act? I think the country has a right to expect the Senate of the United States, if it can, to say that it has the power to act and the extent and character of that power, or to say that it has not power to act and that the people must rely exclusively upon the action of the State governments.

Mr. President, I have stated from the beginning that the power of Congress over this subject comes from the commerce clause of the Constitution. If there is any other power for legislation by us upon this subject I do not know where it comes from. I know when I say this that the oleomargarine bill, which became a law a few years ago, was passed under the revenue power. I have no disposition to discuss that. At the time, it was almost a confessed fact in the House of Representatives, of which I was then a member, that the revenue provision was simply inserted to give jurisdiction, because there was a surplus of money and no cause for increased revenue. However that may be, my judgment is that where taxes are involved, whether a necessity or as an expedient, the courts would be likely to sustain as constitutional a law based upon that idea.

I have examined with a good deal of care, and certainly with no disposition to be hypercritical, the bill reported by the Finance Committee, to which I shall refer for one moment. I think, as I stated on a former occasion, that the country owes to the distinguished Senator from Ohio a debt of gratitude for his efforts to bring this subject before the Senate and to secure action, whether he has been successful in bringing it before the Senate in a proper form or not. The bill, as I understand it, which is reported by the committee, is not wholly unconstitutional. The first clause of the first section, it seems to me, is clearly within the Constitution.

That all arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between two or more citizens or corporations, or both, of different States, or between two or more citizens or corporations, or both, of the United States and foreign states, or citizens or corporations thereof, made with a view or which tend to prevent full and free competition in the importation, transportation, or sale of articles imported into the United States.

What is here described is made unlawful. The words "or sale of articles" ought to have added to them, "while the original packages remain unbroken," to have brought it within the constitutional clause. Then, it does not seem to me to have been necessary to say that these individuals or corporations should be citizens of different States, when it refers to the importation of articles under the Constitution. That brings it under the commerce clause. The other part of the paragraph was unnecessary to give Congress jurisdiction, in my judgment. So, while I would not employ the words used in this bill, because it assigns for jurisdiction some things not necessary to give jurisdiction, it is, within the purview of the Constitution, a regulation of foreign commerce.

Then the second provision pointing out the ground of jurisdiction, which I shall not go over, beginning on line 10, and the third provision giving jurisdiction, which I shall not read, beginning on line 3, on the second page, and ending at line 21, while well intended, it seems to me can not be sustained by the courts of the country, for they do not lay any known predicate for jurisdiction; that is, any predicate that I have learned from the Constitution or from the reading of the commentaries upon it.

The Senator from Mississippi spoke of the various bills introduced by the Senator from Ohio and reported from the Finance Committee in his argument in favor of a reference of all these bills to the Judiciary Committee. I listened to see whether he would not take up the bill now under consideration as an amendment, and give his reasons why that ought to be referred to the Judiciary Committee. I allude to the bill which I have offered as an amendment to the Finance Committee's bill. My amendment has been read two or three times, but I will venture to tax the Senate to read it again, prefacing what I have to say by the statement that it is based alone upon the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, and that in my judgment, though we may seek as many sources of power as we choose, we shall find none outside of that and outside of the taxing power, which can not be applied to bills originating in the Senate.

Besides what Congress can do under the commerce clause of the Constitution, the rest, as I took occasion to say a few days ago, must be done by the State Legislatures. One of the great mistakes that seem to me to be made by the people of the country—and it appears to some extent to permeate the Halls of Congress—is that all grievances must be dealt with by Congress, without reference to the question of the source of power enabling us to deal with the subject. When we have exhausted our power under the commerce clause of the Constitution, which must be a confessed power for this purpose, then the people must rely upon the Legislatures of the several States for the rest of the legislation on the subject. I do not mean by this to be understood that no legislation ought to be adopted by Congress. I believe that it is the duty of Congress to pass such legislation as is within its constitutional power in order that it may be supplemented by appropriate legislation of a much larger scope in the several States.

With these preliminary remarks I desire again to call attention (and I am sorry the Senator from Mississippi is not in his seat) to the provisions of the amendment pending before the Senate:

That all persons engaged in the creation of any trust, or as owner or part owner, agent, or manager of any trust, employed in any business carried on with any foreign country, or between the States, or between any State and the District of Columbia, or between any State and any Territory of the United States, or any owner or part owner, agent, or manager of any corporation, company, or person, employed in any such business, using its powers for either of the purposes specified in the second section of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $10,000 or imprisonment at hard labor in the penitentiary not exceeding five years, or by both of said penalties, in the discretion of the court trying the same.

It has been suggested to me that the penalty is pretty high. It will be observed that simply the maximum penalties are given, and they are given the same as in the committee's bill. The courts have all the way from nothing up to the maximum given here in their discretion in trying these cases, so that the judgment of the court will determine how much of this penalty shall be applied in each case, according to the special circumstances of the case. I would have no objection if it was thought necessary to reduce the maximum; but when we remember that these penalties have relation to great and powerful corporations as well as to less important combinations, it will be seen that strong measures will be necessary to control and repress the mischievous action.

The second section of my amendment, which would be the fourth section of the bill, if adopted, is:

That a trust is a combination of capital, skill, or acts by two or more persons, firms, corporations, or associations of persons, or of any two or more of them, for either, any, or all of the following purposes—

These are trusts under the power of the first section, resting upon the commerce clause of the Constitution—

First. To create or carry out any restrictions in trade.
Second. To limit or reduce the production or to increase or reduce the price of merchandise or commodities.

That is for the purpose and under the authority mentioned in the first section.

Third. To prevent competition in the manufacture, making, purchase, sale, or transportation of merchandise, produce, or commodities.

Fourth. To fix a standard or figure whereby the price to the public shall be in any manner controlled or established of any article, commodity, merchandise, produce, or commerce intended for sale, use, or consumption.

Fifth. To create a monopoly in the making, manufacture, purchase, sale, or transportation of any merchandise, article, produce, or commodity.

Sixth. To make, or enter into, or execute, or carry out any contract, obligation, or agreement of any kind or description by which they shall bind or shall have bound themselves not to manufacture, sell, dispose of, or transport any article or commodity, or article of trade, use, merchandise, or consumption below a common standard figure, or by which they shall agree, in any manner, to keep the price of such article, commodity, or transportation at a fixed or graduated figure, or by which they shall, in any manner, establish or settle the price of any article, commodity, or transportation between themselves or between themselves and others, so as to preclude free and unrestricted competition among themselves and others in the sale and transportation of any such article or commodity, or by which they shall agree to pool, combine, or unite in any interest they may have in connection with the sale or transportation of any such article or commodity that its price may, in any manner, be so affected.

The third section, which will be the fifth of the bill if it shall be adopted, provides that each day's violation of the law shall be a separate offense.

I apprehend that those who have looked at my amendment and taken up the clauses in the second section have considered them as independent, and assumed that they were questions to be dealt with by the State authority, and so they would be if the first section was out of the amendment, but that limits them, as I will read again for emphasis:

That all persons engaged in the creation of any trust, or as owner or part owner, agent, or manager of any trust, employed in any business carried on with any foreign country, or between the States, or between any State and the District of Columbia, or between any State and any Territory of the United States, or any owner or part owner, agent, or manager of any corporation, company, or person employed in any such business, using its powers for either of the purposes specified in the second section of this act—

That is, all those things that I have just enumerated—shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor.

So I beg of those who come to criticize this amendment that they will look to see that it is all brought distinctly and clearly under the commerce clause of the Constitution, and I should like to see some of the constitutional lawyers who are discussing this subject place themselves in opposition to that—if they choose to risk their reputations there as lawyers, I mean.

It was said yesterday by the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] that a clause of a bill which he read, which made the power to act rest upon the idea that the subject was declared to be contrary to the policy of a State, was the foundation for Federal jurisdiction to enact a law. For safety I will read the clause:

That when any State shall declare, or heretofore has declared by law, trusts as defined by the true intent and meaning of this act to be unlawful and against public policy, it shall not be lawful thereafter for any person, firm, or corporation to cause to be transported any product or article covered or embraced by such trust from such State to or into any State or Territory or the District of Columbia.

That section is the one the Senator from Missouri alluded to as the only oasis in this great desert of unconstitutionality, and he made it to rest upon the fact that the State has passed a law declaring certain things to be against public policy. I am inclined to think my friend, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] who sits farthest from me, would accept that for a very different reason from the one which the Senator from Missouri asserts it for. The State of Iowa thinks that the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors and wines and beer is against public policy. The State of Missouri and the Senator from Missouri do not so think, but his constitutional argument would enable Congress to determine, not as a constitutional question, but as a question of expediency and morality and policy, that if that State chooses to forbid those things the United States may forbid them also. If the United States can forbid a thing, it must be upon another authority, and not because the State of Iowa has adopted such a provision of law. At least I suggest that; and I suggest further that, if this be a source of constitutional power, it is a new source of power just discovered, not heretofore invoked.

Mr. President, I am inclined to think, in view of the fact that but one member of the Committee on the Judiciary has given any expression that indicates a purpose to mature a law to repress the evil effects of trusts and to punish those engaged in them, that it is not best to refer these measures to that committee. I would rather trust them to the action of the Senate, unless we can have some assurance that that committee will take the subject up and act upon it. If we can have the judgment of that committee, with its reputation for legal and constitutional ability, put to the test, I should be willing to accept it. I do feel that in the multiplied number of bills before us there is danger that we may get provisions adopted which will not be constitutional.

I confess that in offering the measure which I offered as an amendment to the bill reported by the Senator from Ohio, I presented it with the full belief that two of the sources of power invoked by the bill reported by that Senator are not within the Constitution, but I believed if this one is it covers the whole case so far as the criminal part of the law is concerned, and if the other part of it failed the country would not be much at a loss. So I was willing to accept, because I did not well see how to avoid it, that which I did not think strictly conformable to the Constitution, in order to get enough in the law to give it vigor and efficiency, and to protect the people of this country against longer being plundered by the corporations and trusts that are driving the people of the country to despair while other bills are now being acted upon here; and what is the use of sending them to a wet nurse that does not seem to favor them much?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, obtained the floor.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from Iowa yields to me to ask a question of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I only yield for a question.

Mr. PLATT. That is all. I wish to know from the Senator from Texas how far these words in his amendment reach in his construction: "Any business carried on * * * between the States." Let me direct the Senator's attention to what is in my mind—

Mr. REAGAN. In what line are those words found?

Mr. PLATT. In the third and fourth lines of the first section of the Senator's amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield for an answer?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Provided it does not consume too much time.

Mr. PLATT. It will only take a moment. The Senator's amendment contemplates—

Mr. REAGAN. In the first place it would punish persons engaged in the transportation of things by virtue of trusts, and it is possible that it would go beyond that to some extent, but I am not prepared to say exactly the extent to which it would go.

Mr. PLATT. Then the particular purpose in the use of those words, which are the important words, is to reach the transportation which is carried on between the States?

Mr. REAGAN. That is one of the reasons. I need not repeat to the Senator, as I have stated over and over, that I have given the formulation of what seems to me to meet the question under the commerce clause of the Constitution, and I trust that to the Senate and to the country.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] referred to the State of Iowa in connection with the subject now before this body, and stated that he presumed I might be willing to compromise upon the basis of the doctrine stated by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] in his remarks made to the Senate yesterday. I suppose the particular subject to which the Senator from Texas referred was that which was embodied in a bill introduced by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] originally in the Fiftieth Congress and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and which related to the subjection of imported spirituous liquors to the operation of the laws of the several States. That bill was considered by the Committee on the Judiciary and an adverse report was made, there being five members of the committee opposed to the bill and four in favor of it. The minority submitted in connection with their report an amendment to the bill in the form of a substitute, which I will read. It is as follows:

That the payment of any tax, duty, impost, or excise upon or in respect of the importation into the United States of any fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquids or liquors shall not be held to exempt the importer thereof, or any other person, or any such property from any penalty, forfeiture, or proceeding that now is or hereafter may be provided for by the laws of any State applicable equally to all property of the same nature, respecting the manufacture, sale, furnishing, or possession of liquids or liquors; nor shall the payment of any such tax, duty, impost, or excise be held to prohibit or preclude any State from imposing a tax or duty on any such liquids or liquors or from making regulations in respect of the same, in common with and in respect of other such liquids or liquors not imported, or from enforcing its laws, operating equally in respect of property imported and property not imported, against any such importer or person or against any such property, whether the same be in the original package of importation or not.

That was simply an effort to induce Congress to enable the States to give full force and effect to their efforts to enforce their police power. The Supreme Court of the United States, by a decision referred to in the report which I hold in my hand, seems to have interposed some obstacle in the way of the enforcement of the police power of the State, and this bill was intended to aid the State to get around that judicial obstacle which never should have been interposed. The Senator from Missouri was a member of the committee and signed the majority report, or the report, properly speaking, of the committee, and in that report it is stated:

It should not be overlooked that the province of State control over what concerns the police regulation of domestic health, peace, and general good order and well-being within each State is, under the Constitution, as secure against intrusion from Federal authority as the regulation of foreign commerce by the General Government is from encroachment upon that province by State authority. It is not desirable that Federal legislation should seem, by inference even, necessary to impart or maintain aid or protection to the State's exercise of its authority within the province of State domestic control. The State and the Federal control in the premises are divided by the Constitution, and neither for its vigor depends upon the other. The experience of the wise administration hitherto of this judicial question, in defining these respective provinces, in the opinion of the committee, makes it best to leave this, as it now is, a judicial question, in the highest interest of both the Federal regulation of commerce and the State control of its police authority.

In other words, the Senator and those who concurred with him did not deem it proper to say anything about the constitutional question involved, to even recognize by legislation of that kind the propriety of enabling the States to give full force to those powers which by all have been admitted from the foundation to the present time never to have been surrendered to the General Government. Inasmuch as persons in the State of Iowa were hiding behind these special revenue taxes, protecting themselves against the operation and movements of the State officers and violating the law of the State by the importation of liquors, an appeal was made by the State for that aid, but it was met with such statements as I have just read, and was denied.

Mr. President, I am glad that as time goes on opinions change. It took ten years of agitation to bring about the enactment of the law for the regulation of interstate commerce, but it came at last. Through the processes inducing its final enactment changes of opinion were frequent, and I am glad to see in the RECORD of this morning, as I heard yesterday when the Senator from Missouri was speaking, that a change has come over the spirit of his dream since that report was made in the last Congress. I find that in his remarks upon this bill, referring to an amendment introduced by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], he said as follows:

Sir, I object to the bill—

That is, the one reported from the Committee on Finance—

I object to the bill because I am certain, as a lawyer, that the Supreme Court of the United States will never declare it to be constitutional, and for the Senator to assume that he, and he alone, has found the remedy in this case, is, to say the least, transcending the limits of parliamentary modesty.

Now, Mr. President, I will ask the Secretary to read a bill that I think, although I am not the author of it—and I have been for over six months attempting to find some legislation that would meet this evil—I freely accord to another gentleman the merit of having framed a bill that, in my judgment, comes nearer to furnishing a remedy than that presented by any other person, and I ask the Secretary to read the fifth, sixth, and seventh sections of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE]. That is a bill that has been offered in the House of Representatives, and was offered here as an amendment by the Senator, and I ask the attention of the Senate to it.

"SEC. 5. That when any State shall declare, or heretofore has declared by law, trusts as defined by the true intent and meaning of this act to be unlawful and against public policy, it shall not be lawful thereafter for any person, firm, or corporation to cause to be transported any product or article covered or embraced by such trust from such State to or into any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 6. That any common carrier, or agent of any common carrier, who shall knowingly receive such product or commodity for transportation from such State into another State or Territory or the District of Columbia shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than five hundred or more than ten thousand dollars or shall be imprisoned for any period of time not less than one year and not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. And any person who shall knowingly deliver to any common carrier, or agent thereof, any such product or commodity to be transported into another State or Territory or the District of Columbia shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not less than five hundred nor more than ten thousand dollars, or by imprisonment for any period of time not less than one year nor more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

"SEC. 7. That whenever the President of the United States shall be advised that a trust has been or is about to be organized for either of the purposes named in the first section of this act, and that a like product or commodity covered or proposed to be covered or handled by such trust, when produced out of the United States, is liable to an import duty when imported into the United States, he shall be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to suspend the operation of so much of the laws as impose a duty upon such product, commodity, or merchandise for such time as he may deem proper."

After the reading of these sections by the Secretary the Senator from Missouri proceeded as follows:

Mr. VEST. Now, Mr. President, there is a measure much more radical than that of the Senator from Ohio, far more effective, and not subject to any constitutional objection. Not even the most hair-splitting constitutional casuist, such as to-day has been denounced by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. FURN], can find any objection to that measure; and if my friends on the opposite side of the Chamber object to the seventh section because it deals with the question of import duties, if they do not want to give the President of the United States discretion to take off import duties when they protect a trust, let them strike it out.

But the broad ground is assumed and occupied by the Senator that the provisions embraced in the three sections of the bill offered as an amendment by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] are wholly beyond constitutional objection. If that be so, I should like to know why that bill of the Fiftieth Congress relating to the importation of foreign intoxicating liquors was obnoxious to constitutional objection. And is it possible that we are to be driven to the extreme of saying that the State is entitled to that remedy provided first (leaving its police power wholly out of the case) it shall declare that a trust exists within its borders in respect of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors; and yet if that should be done what protection would that give to the State of Iowa, or any other State which in the exercise of its police powers should enact legislation similar to that now in force in Iowa?

This only provides that in case the States declare a trust in accordance with the provisions of the first section of the bill, then it shall be operative. But suppose there were no trust for the manufacture and sale of liquor in the State of Iowa, still this flood can be poured on; and yet if in the State of Illinois or the State of Missouri, or any other of the surrounding States, there should be a statutory declaration against a trust or alleging the existence of a trust for the manufacture of these liquors within that State, then the provision of this bill would be effective and remedy might be had under its provisions.

Mr. President, you may debate the question as to where the line of constitutional power to enact legislation of this kind will go, and support it, because it is seemingly a new field where by your Congressional legislation you first ask the State to define the object upon which your national legislation may act, overlooking that more substantial field which has been recognized from the foundation of the Government down to the present time, in which it is affirmed that the police powers of the States were retained by them at the formation of the Government, and not surrendered to the United States, but that in regard to those things not surrendered no Congressional action can be had to aid the States in the enforcement of their laws or in protecting them against the infractions which are practiced under color of the United States laws.

What then? States that do not care to exercise their police powers for the protection of the health and morals of their people may be protected by Congressional legislation against a combination to reduce the price of anything as well as to raise it, and yet I think that Senators who engage in this discussion would find it difficult to induce all the people who have been asking for legislation of this character to approve of a measure which should put up a stone wall against the reduction of price. People are generally willing to accept the advantages of reduction, while they may be crying out against the disadvantages of a sudden rise.

So, Mr. President, it is well enough, in the discussion of these great public questions, to be certain, at least reasonably so, that in our endeavor to answer a widespread public demand such as has induced the introduction of these trust bills, we do not overlook and trample into the dust the recognized powers of the States in other fields.

I do not care to prolong this discussion, for I know the Senate is weary of it and desires to vote, but I can not resist the temptation to call the attention of the Senate to the strange contrast existing between the position assumed in connection with the bill in the last Congress upon the subject of imported liquors and that assumed in the present with respect to trusts.

Now, Mr. President, I am in favor of legislation upon this subject. I desire to reach it at the earliest practicable moment. I remember well, and I have already stated, that through the long lines of ten years the agitation moved before it brought the result of the enactment of the law for the regulation of interstate commerce. I do not want this agitation to run through ten years of time, and yet I do not expect a perfect remedy from any act which this Congress may pass. These things are of gradual growth, and it is well for us and all the people who are looking for a remedy to keep in mind one prominent fact, and that is that no act of Congress, no act of any legislative body will enforce itself, so that not only officers of the United States entrusted with the administration of the law and the officers of the States entrusted with the administration of the laws must take care to see that it is enforced, but the citizen who may be injured by infractions also must give his attention and aid in order to make the remedy effective and perfect.

Now, in order that we may reach action as early as practicable, I am inclined to, and at present believe I shall, vote against the reference of this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary; not that I fear that it would not have conservative and forceful consideration and reasonably early action there, but for the very different reason that I want some bill passed by this body that may go to the other House for action, and where doubtless there may be disagreement; and if that disagreement should bring us to the position of a conference between the two bodies, from it may be evolved a start at least towards legislation in this very important field. For that reason I shall so vote as to bring us to as early a resolution in the Senate as possible, so that we may put ourselves in the same attitude we were in in connection with the bill for the regulation of interstate commerce, a conference between the two Houses, and the result, at least to a considerable degree, effective legislation looking to the accomplishment of the ends so generally desired.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I do not know that, if it were, the fact that I occupied a position inconsistent with that which I occupy in regard to the bills now before the Senate during the last Congress, as to the bill referred to by the Senator from Iowa, would practically affect the question now pending at all. I am unable, however, to see that there is anything inconsistent in the position or the vote which I gave in the Judiciary Committee in regard to the bill to which the Senator has referred with that occupied by me to-day. But whether the inconsistency exists or not is really an immaterial question.

The report to which the Senator from Iowa has referred was concurred in by me, but without a concurrence in the argument then used in its support. I gave my vote against the bill which he introduced in regard to the transportation of liquors from one State to another, but I did not give that vote on the argument which was used in that report and which I did not write. I stated in the committee, if I did not state in the Senate, that my opposition to that legislation was based upon the single fact that the Government of the United States recognized the traffic in liquor as legitimate, that it was an article of merchandise both as to foreign and internal commerce, that we collected a large amount of money as excise duties upon the manufacture of ardent spirits in the United States, and that the legislation proposed by the Senator from Iowa was absolutely inconsistent with the position assumed by the General Government upon that subject.

Now, Mr. President, it is absolutely within the power of the Congress of the United States, under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, in its power to regulate commerce, to prohibit the carrying of any article from one State to another. That is absolutely and exclusively within the power of the General Government and of Congressional action. The police power of the State is an entirely different jurisdiction, as distinct and separate from the interstate-commerce clause in the Federal Constitution as any two subjects can possibly be. What analogy can be drawn between the traffic in ardent spirits and the subject of trusts in regard to which we are legislating now? Is there any State in this Union that can ever be expected to legislate in favor of these unlawful combines and trusts as defined in the first amendment submitted by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE]? That section reads as follows:

That a trust is a combination of capital or skill by two or more persons, firms, or corporations for the purpose of creating or employing restrictions on trade, or limiting the production, increasing or reducing the price of merchandise or commodities, or preventing competition in the making, manufacture, sale, or purchase of merchandise or commodities, or creating a monopoly in the manufacture, making, sale, or purchase of any merchandise or commodity with intent to forestall the market value of any merchandise or commodity.

There is a trust unlawful under the common law. There is no common law of the United States, but the common law prevails in all the States of the Union. They have in the State of Louisiana a mixed jurisdiction or a mixed system of laws composed of the common law of England and the Code Napoléon, or the civil law of France, but in all the other States the common law prevails, and that law without statutory enactment makes all such combinations as are prescribed or defined in the States of the Union and this amendment to be unlawful. The section which I condemned reads as follows:

SEC. 5. That when any State shall declare, or heretofore has declared by law, trusts as defined by the true intent and meaning of this act to be unlawful and against public policy.

That is surplusage, because by the common law, which obtains in all the States, the combination, as defined in the first section, which I have read, is unlawful and void; and is it pretended that there is anything in the Constitution of the United States that militates against the idea that under the interstate-commerce clause of the Federal Constitution Congress can treat as unlawful and void and prohibit the transportation of the products of any such combinations as are here defined from one State to another?

The Senator from Iowa speaks of a police law which is enacted against a commodity that is unlawful under the common law, an article of merchandise. Alcoholic stimulants are as much an article of merchandise under the common law and under the laws of a majority of the States of this Union as corn or wheat or pork; and because the Senator from Iowa or the Senator from Texas believes that traffic to be unlawful, the law is not changed as it is in the common law or as it is upon the statute-books of the respective States. What analogy is there between the two? In the one case there is an unlawful combination by the laws of all the States, and if there were a common law of the United States it would be unlawful under that. In the other case there is simply a police regulation as to an article of drink which many intelligent and worthy men believe to be absolutely necessary to human life and human comfort.

I must confess, sir, that I am unable to see even in the exigencies of debate a justification for the assumption made by the Senator from Iowa that the two cases are parallel, and that my inconsistency is therefore apparent.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President, I do not see the inconsistency on this side of the line that the Senator from Missouri has referred to. Now, the remedy that he proposes by giving his indorsement and support to the amendment presented by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] amounts to this, so far as the question that he addressed his attention to is concerned, that if the State of Iowa or the State of Missouri should find within its borders a combination to put down or put up the price of intoxicating liquors it might pass an act declaring that to be an unlawful combination, and then if this amendment should become a law the State would get the help of the United States and its power to prevent the exportation from that State of the products of that trust, but it would not get the aid of the United States to protect the State that had thus declared a trust existing within its borders from the intrusion of the same article from other States where that trust had not been declared. So then, instead of aiding the States in the enforcement of their police powers, it would simply be an additional means for overriding those powers, notwithstanding the desire of the State.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator from Iowa will permit me—

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. He makes his argument from one standpoint and I make mine from another. He is now going upon the assumption that the General Government exercises this power under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution to aid the police powers of the State. That is not my idea. I hold and claim that the General Government, under the interstate-commerce clause, has a right to prohibit an article from going from one State into another, without regard to any police regulation by any State in the Union. It is a very broad, comprehensive, general power that is vested in Congress alone.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is to say, Congress may enact a law which shall declare that certain articles recognized as belonging to the field of interstate commerce may be taken into Missouri from Iowa and taken into Illinois from Minnesota, but they shall not be returned from those States into the States from which they were shipped, nor shall they go there from any other State. That is, there shall be a kind of checker-board enacted by Congress, so that the States may jump from one to another and pick up one another as you do in playing a game of checkers. That is not constitutional law, Mr. President. You must recognize a principle which will apply to all alike, and when you have applied it to one it will allow the application to others. So that, as has always been recognized in regard to the police powers of the State, belonging as they do wholly to the State, recognized as they were in all the early decisions of the Supreme Court as belonging there, you have got to give your aid so that the States will possess them all, and not obtrude obstacles in the way of their enforcement.

Mr. President, as I said when I was on the floor first to-day, the conditions existing in the country seem to change the opinions of men with regard to the same character of question, and I have no doubt that there are supporters of this amendment of the Senator from Texas and other amendments which have been offered here, that if they had been prepared with equal vigor in some other line of action as clearly constitutional as this would have expressed quite a different judgment in respect to them, just as we see in the case of the bill of the last Congress to which I have referred and the bill we are now discussing. But there must be that consistency which will give each State the same rights in the enforcement of its powers and the enjoyment of its privileges under the Constitution and which shall impose the same kind of conditions upon others. The State which I in part represent asks no departure from that line. Her Senators and Representatives are ready to aid in the enactment of proper legislation for the protection and for the indorsement of the rights of the other States as well as hers, and in regard to the illustration which I used in connection with the bill of the last Congress, all that we ask is that there shall be that proper recognition of the doctrine of State rights that will protect the State of Iowa or any other State and recognize her police powers within her own borders without asking any other State to follow her example except by her own voluntary election.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Chair to state the pending question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is the amendment moved by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to the motion made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] to commit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN. What was the amendment of the Senator from Alabama?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To commit with instructions that the Committee on the Judiciary should report within twenty days.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, it is a very unusual proceeding in the Senate of the United States, very rarely resorted to, to refer the action of one committee to another. It is not a wise proceeding to take at any time. Although there have been cases of the kind, they are very rare. Such a course would create controversies and contention and rivalry between committees, each of which is supposed to understand the duty that is enjoined upon it. As a general rule, such a proposition ought not to be made; but in this particular case I appeal to every Senator to say whether it would be wise to do it. One of these propositions is now pending before the Judiciary Committee, and it has been there for two, three, or four months—I do not know how long. When did the Senator from Texas introduce his proposition?

Mr. REAGAN. I introduced it on the first day of the session, I think, as a bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the first day of the session. It has been in that committee almost four months, and nothing has been done. Now, the Committee on Finance was charged with somewhat the same subject-matter. It has been deliberated upon carefully; the committee revised its decision once or twice. Perhaps the criticism of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] in that respect is correct. It made changes and withdrew from them. But we have considered the subject and very carefully considered it, and opinions have been expressed to the Senate and they are here. Now to send that work to a committee which has already had charge of the subject-matter for four months and has not acted upon it, is rather a damaging proposition. If it is proposed to kill this measure, let it be done in a fair and legitimate way.

The fact that the two members of the Judiciary Committee, both eminent and distinguished lawyers, have given their opinion in favor of the idea that Congress has no constitutional power to pass such a bill, or any of these bills, it seems to me should show us that we ought to have a better nursing mother than that to send the bill to. Under all the circumstances is it right to do that? Is there any probability if this bill is referred now to the Judiciary Committee that they will be able to come to any satisfactory conclusion in two or three weeks and report a bill back to us? Shall we be one bit advanced in regard to it? Not at all. It will only create new debates and long contention. I think that Senators have had every phase of this question presented to them.

As to the pending amendment, I have no sensibility about it. I am perfectly willing to accept any amendment that may be adopted by the Senate. If the Senate by a vote should adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas, well and good. As I stated, I do not believe in it; that is, I think it is better not now to put upon this proposed law a criminal proceeding, although I originally voted for such a proposition. Still, if the Senate chooses to put it on, well and good. It will probably, in the opinion of some, strengthen the bill, and in the opinion of others it will probably weaken it. Let the judgment of the Senate be carried out when expressed.

Then as to the proposition made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] that some distinct proposition of law should be inserted in this bill giving the court in proper cases the power to send its process, its summons, or notice to parties in other States, there is no objection to such a provision. Indeed, as I lost the suit of my first client some thirty-five years ago, when I entered public life, I am not very familiar with the practice of the courts; but I find, on examination, that the law already provides, in certain cases, that just that thing may be done. Such a statute has existed for many years, and here is a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the subject regulating and pointing out the necessity of having parties from other States and from all over the jurisdiction of the United States in certain cases. The case decided was a case where the suit was to quiet title to land, a suit in equity, and notice was sent under the law of 1875, I think it was, to different parties in different States. So there is no trouble in meeting that difficulty. The court may, in the exercise of its discretion, serve notice of the pendency of this proceeding upon all the parties wherever they may live, and it goes broadcast wherever they may live, and even from foreign countries it may summon them to take their part in the trial of the case. The Senator from Wisconsin, who is a practicing lawyer and engaged now in cases in the United States courts, is thoroughly familiar with that matter, and he has prepared a section that will cover it entirely. I have not only no objection to it, but I shall be very glad indeed to have it provided for.

The language which was inserted by the Committee on Finance required these combinations to be made between persons or corporations in different States in order to come within the jurisdiction thereby created. That language was inserted by the Committee on Finance. I did not think it was necessary on the first draughting of the bill, but that was deemed necessary, and now the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] thinks those words ought to be stricken out. I do not care whether they are in or out. It does not make any difference in my judgment as to the effect of this bill. I shall be glad to have it either way in order to satisfy Senators, but I can not satisfy them all.

The Senator from Massachusetts objects to the words "in a civil suit." I have no objection to their being stricken out. I would say, using the language of the Constitution of the United States, "all cases in law or equity," or, which is better, "all controversies between persons living in different States."

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would have it either way. The second section refers to controversies between parties.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will allow me to call his attention to one thing. That first section being criticised yesterday, he stated that it was intended to apply to suits brought by the United States. Now, as I understand him, he is willing to substitute the phrase in the first section, "controversies between citizens of different States." That clearly would exclude the United States altogether.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator does not correctly state my case.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator would make that amendment he would have a section which provided that controversies between citizens of different States should be taken possession of by the district attorney or the Attorney-General and conducted to final judgment and execution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will explain to the Senator from Massachusetts in regard to the bill. It is strange he can not distinguish between the first and second sections. He dislikes the bill so much that he can not state the case fairly. I refer to all actions at law or in equity in the first section of the bill. I use the language of the Constitution of the United States in defining the cases that arise under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and so "all cases at law or in equity of a civil nature." These words he objects to, and I am willing to strike them out. These words are there because they are used in the Constitution of the United States.

When I come to describe these things in the second section, there the words "controversies between citizens of different States" are used, so that there can be no misunderstanding.

The first section deals with suits brought by the United States in the name of the United States to check, and control, and enjoin, and regulate these corporations. The second section provides for suits between parties, and there, I think, they ought to be classed as controversies between parties of different States; and that is the distinction laid down.

Now, Mr. President, all I desire is that this bill shall be voted upon. I believe that in a half-hour we can take the vote on the proposition of the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN]. If that is adopted, well and good. We can vote then upon the proposition of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] and then adopt the amendments that are suggested on either side. Correct this bill as you will, and we can have a bill which, while it may not be perfect, while it may not go far enough to suit me or may in some respects go further than I think is wise, yet we shall have a tangible proposition that we can send to the House of Representatives for their consideration, and in that way we can dismiss from the Senate of the United States, for this session at least, this question and controversy about trusts and combinations. If we send this bill to the Judiciary Committee and await their report to come back to us, we shall have to go over all this ground again and we shall be simply wasting time that is valuable to the people of the United States.

It must be remembered that we have been in session for nearly four months and we have not dealt with any of the great questions which we have to deal with within the next three or four months; and if we now palter with the question, send it to another committee and go over another long debate of three or four days on another report, what is to become of other questions which are pending, the tariff question, the silver question—involving grave consequences and upon which honest men may disagree—the dependent pension bill, and many other like bills? We had better dispose of this bill, and I hope we shall dispose of it before we go to dinner to-day, and end it.

Mr. HOAR. I wish only to say a word. I have a strange incapacity to understand my honorable friend from Ohio. It is entirely owing to my dullness, of course.

Mr. SHERMAN. And mine.

Mr. HOAR. But I think if the Senator from Ohio will look at the Reporter's notes of his speech he will find that he said just now that he had put into this bill the words "all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity," and that he put them in because they were the words of the Constitution.

Mr. SHERMAN. Substantially.

Mr. HOAR. But he said he thought he would like to substitute for them, as on the whole better, "controversies between citizens of different States." That is exactly what he said. I think that will be found in the Senator's remarks, and I think it will be found in the memory of every Senator who listened to him. Then I called his attention to the fact that he said yesterday the first section was intended to provide for suits by the United States, and that the substitution of the words "between citizens of different States" cut off suits by the United States altogether. He says in reply to that that I misunderstood him, and that he was talking about the second section; but if he will look at the second section he will find that there is no place in that section where those words belong; that there is nothing appropriate to them; that there is nothing to be stricken out for which they are to be substituted. The second section provides—

That any person or corporation injured or damaged by such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination * * * may sue for and recover, in any court of the United States, * * * twice the amount of damages sustained.

Does the Senator mean to limit the second section to cases of controversies between citizens of different States? Of course not. If the combination against which the bill is leveled has injured me through foreign or interstate commerce, does he mean to say that his purpose in the bill is to provide that I can only have a remedy when I am damaged by citizens of different States from my own? The second section has nothing at all to do with residence in different States.

My honorable friend says that I dislike his bill. I do not. I like his bill very much; and I like it as he had it; but he has proposed this amendment. He has answered to every single criticism I have made upon it, if I recollect aright—there may be possibly one exception—that he was of that way of thinking himself in the first place, but that he yielded his judgment to the opinion of others in order to make the bill go through. What I want is to have the great authority of the Senator in his original judgment, not in his yielding to other people, in favor of a bill which I should like to vote for.

That is the difference between the Senator and me. I want him to strike out these words which make the bill apply to only one-one-hundredth part of the cases that it ought to apply to, and to have it as the Senator first reported it. Then I want a penal provision put in and have it as the Senator originally designed it, and with one or two other little amendments in which I shall have the Senator's entire concurrence, if I understand him, I propose heartily to support his bill.

My honorable friend seems to me, owing to my great dullness of expression and failure of clearness, to have understood a concurrence with his opinion somehow or other as a criticism upon his bill. I say again that in making those amendments I do not see where he can put in the words "controversies between citizens of different States" in the second section. There is nothing to be stricken out for which they can be properly a substitute. The second section is not drawn on the theory that makes it proper, and if he does he will do in the second section what, contrary to his judgment, if put in the first, will make the bill apply to but a very small proportion or fraction of the cases it ought to reach.

Mr. SHERMAN. The whole idea is that the Senator differs as to my statement of the case; but when he comes to offer the amendments he will find them not very important and probably those I shall cheerfully accede to. I hope we shall have a vote on the question of reference.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President—

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Nevada allow me to make a personal explanation? It will not take a minute.

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Ohio in speaking of the Judiciary Committee as being rather an unfriendly body to send this bill to referred to two Senators upon that committee, by which, I suppose, he alluded to myself and the Senator from Missouri, as having already prejudged the case and having decided in our own minds that there is no constitutional power on the subject. I desire to say that, whilst that is my opinion with regard to the Senator's bill, I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] is a valid and constitutional bill, and I certainly think that the one which I prepared and which I shall offer is a valid and constitutional bill.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, while this debate has been proceeding I have been thinking about the practical operation of the bill reported from the Committee on Finance if it should be passed and could be enforced as a constitutional law. I call particular attention to the clause commencing in the seventeenth line:

And all arrangements, trusts, or combinations between such citizens or corporations, made with a view or which tend to advance the cost to the consumer of any such articles, are hereby declared to be against public policy, unlawful, and void.

Now, it is a well known fact that since the money power abandoned the old automatic system of allowing the quantity of money to be governed by the product of the mines or by the quantity of gold and silver obtainable, and provided that only one metal should be manufactured and both should enter into production, there has been a decline in prices and that it has now reached a point where there is great distress in the country. There is now great distress on account of falling prices, which necessarily follow contraction. There are many manufacturing establishments that find they can not make any money; they are losing money and see that they will have to go into bankruptcy if something is not done. Men agree, for instance, that they will manufacture only a certain amount, no more than the market will take, in order to keep up the prices, so as to avoid bankruptcy. Those arrangements are common; they are of every-day occurrence. But under this bill would they not be subject to the pains and penalties prescribed? If producers did not have the power to make such an agreement in times like these, when prices are declining, when they are putting their money in one year and can not get it out the next year because prices have declined—if they could not make an agreement to check production and wait for better times to bridge over the trouble, they would be ruined; and this bill would probably, if carried out literally, in times of depression, break up half the manufacturing establishments in the country. That is one of the ordinary effects, one of the ordinary arrangements which are necessary in times like these, that would be in violation of the bill.

Then again we will take, for example, the beef trust in Chicago. There is a trust which has put up the price of beef, a trust that we have been investigating and want to remedy. There is a plain remedy for that trust, not in legislation perhaps, but in the action of the parties interested. Farmers who are producing beef have to sell it at an enormous sacrifice, at starvation prices. Cattle are cheap all through the country. Still beef is high in Chicago. Suppose the farmers in the West should unite and say, "We will not sell our beef except at a certain price." Suppose they should unite to beat this combination; they would all be criminals under this bill; they could not combine to beat it at all.

Suppose, again, a combination is formed in Chicago by citizens of Chicago, not citizens of different States, but all citizens of Chicago, to bear the prices. The farmers of different States would have no right to combine and say, "We will not sell any wheat; we will help each other; we will advance money to each other; we will not sell any wheat until this combination is broken up; we will not allow them to sell our wheat short, to sell something they have not got and bear the market, and we will not take our wheat to market to be robbed." That they could not do under this proposed law. They would be liable to all the pains and penalties of the law if they did.

Again, suppose that the employers, railroad companies, and manufacturing establishments should say that labor shall be put down to two bits a day. Suppose that capital should combine against labor, as it is very much inclined to do, and there should be a combination among the laborers which would increase the cost of production and increase the cost of all articles consumed. Suppose there should be a combination among the laborers to protect themselves from grasping monopolies; they would all be criminals for doing it.

This measure strikes at the very root of competition. It strikes at the very root of self-preservation. It strikes at the very root of organization. It strikes at the very root of co-operation.

The time was in England when everything was parceled out to some particular favorite. Men who sold beef were not allowed to raise it; they were not allowed to bring it into market in certain ways. It had to pass through certain channels. All were trammelled; there was no liberty, no competition; but after having tried that thing for a hundred years, England wiped it all out and said, "We will have competition."

Co-operation is necessary; but co-operation has its evils. When capital is combined and strong, it will for a time produce evils, but if you take away the right of co-operation you take away the power to redress those evils; it gives rise to monopolies that are protected by law, against which the people can not combine. They can not have other monopolies equal to them. It is that which depresses the people.

For instance, the patent laws of the United States create monopolies, and there is more money made by speculators under the patent laws, because they have monopolies. There is no way for the people to combine and form co-operation against the patent laws. While in England every privilege was parceled out to corporations and to private individuals, favorites of the Crown, there was no way for the people to compete with them; but now, in the march of progress, we find everything has been changed and there is freedom of action, freedom of combination, and when one combination is formed, if it is not beneficial, if it puts up the price, others will be formed that will put the price down, and there will be competition. But if you deny the right to combine in order to compete with the capitalists, in order to compete with strong establishments, you go back hundreds of years.

This bill is a step in the wrong direction. It is a step back towards the dark ages. It is a declaration against the freedom of man, against freedom of action. If one corporation is making too much money there will be other corporations, and that is the remedy which modern civilization has invented. That is the remedy which has brought about the present development of the civilized world. All the States, instead of having corporations dealt out to private individuals by private statutes, have passed general incorporation laws, and there is as much freedom of competition between corporations now as there is between individuals.

The great harmfulness of corporations was that they were monopolies; that others could not form them. It required special acts or special favors to create them; the people could not form them. If you take away the right to form combinations to meet combination, you will have monopoly in this country to your heart's content. It would be the accumulated capital that would prosecute the new concerns that are starting. This bill would be an engine of oppression to break down all competition, because as soon as one was forming those in existence would bring suit immediately. They would have the power and the money, and the poor people struggling to meet the combinations in existence would not have the power to resist them. What could a labor organization do when its individual members were sued by the Government for belonging to a labor organization, a combination which has a tendency to put up the price of labor or its products? It would be helpless against the power of these great corporations, which have abundance of money to prosecute these suits.

Why take away the right of the laborers of America to compete in production with these great corporations? Why take away from the people the power to resist corporations, the power to organize for the purpose of bettering themselves? Organization is everything; individuals literally nothing. No great enterprises are conducted now without organization. As I said yesterday, the individual man by himself can be but little above a savage. He can not supply himself with the wants, let alone the luxuries of life. He must be as a savage if he is alone. He must avail himself of the labor of others. Inter-association (and in my judgment this bill strikes at the principle of association) is necessary to afford competition; it is necessary to provide means for the development of the country; it is necessary for the laboring men and the producers of the country. If they will develop its resources they will benefit themselves, and if they will resist oppression they must have this right. The bill takes away the sacred right of co-operation, and it ought not to be passed into a law.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary I simply desire to say that in my opinion a reference of this bill to that committee will be the last of it for this session. I think I have knowledge enough to enable me to say that the enemies of the bill can not adopt more efficient action to destroy it than to send it to that committee.

I am a friend of this bill and of many of the amendments that have been offered to it. The Senate is in just as good condition, is just as well informed and prepared to pass upon the amendments now as it will be hereafter, or as the Judiciary Committee are. I have no idea that the Judiciary Committee can formulate a bill, that will meet with the concurrence of a majority of that committee, that has any life in it, and I insist that we should dispose of the bill and the amendments, and vote down the proposition to refer to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HISCOCK. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator before he takes his seat. Do I understand from him that he thinks a majority of the very able lawyers constituting the Judiciary Committee would come to the conclusion that the bill is unconstitutional and void?

Mr. PUGH. On that subject I am not prepared to speak; I am not sufficiently familiar with the constitutional opinions of the members of that committee, except as to those who have expressed them in this debate.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suppose if the bill and the amendments should be referred to the Judiciary Committee, it would be for the purpose of having the opinion of that committee upon the constitutional objections that have been urged against the bill, and my inquiry pointed to the fact whether the Senator knows that a majority of the eminent gentlemen who constitute that committee believe that this scheme of legislation would be unconstitutional and void.

Mr. PUGH. We have had the opinion of two very able members of that committee, learned and able lawyers, that there is no power under the Constitution to pass the bill or any amendment now pending or proposed except the one offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE]. While I am ready to vote for that amendment, I have no idea that a majority of the Judiciary Committee will favor it. The difficulty in that committee is with the variety of opinion that it has both as to constitutional power and as to the provisions of a bill to reach this evil. My opinion is that the variety of that opinion will prevent any concurrence in favor of a bill that has any vitality in it, and we are more apt to give it by voting in the Senate on the amendments as they are presented and will be in order than by letting that committee deal with this question and make a report to the Senate. I have no idea but what any report that it may make of any bill would be subjected to the same number of amendments, if not more, than the bill now pending before the Senate.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will say to the Senator upon the same question and upon the same line that if the bill with the amendments is to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary I would like the motion to be modified so as to call for a report from that committee upon the constitutional and legal questions involved, not upon the framework of a bill especially, for that we could take care of here. I could have my opinion as to what the provisions ought to be, as well as any one else. I hope that the Senator who made the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary will amend his motion in that they shall be called upon to express themselves as to the constitutional power of enacting this legislation.

Mr. PLATT obtained the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President—

Mr. PLATT. I will yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. The remark made by the Senator from Alabama calls for some response from me. The Senator said if the bill should be referred to the Judiciary Committee, he had no idea it would be heard from during the remainder of this session. The Senator from Alabama has no warrant for making any such statements, I think.

Mr. PUGH. It is merely my opinion, of course.

Mr. GEORGE. The Judiciary Committee, I believe, have been as diligent in performing the duties which the Senate have imposed upon them as any other committee of this body. There is the motion now pending, made by the Senator's colleague [Mr. MORGAN], requiring that committee to report within twenty days, and then there is the parliamentary power in this body, which the Senator seems to have overlooked, that when a matter is referred to a committee and that committee fails and neglects for an unreasonable time to report, to discharge the committee and bring the matter before the Senate directly.

Taking these things into consideration, I think the Senator's remark is wholly unwarranted. It is not the intention of the Senator, that is, myself, who made the motion to refer, to dispose of the bill in that way. My object in making the motion is to give us a bill, if one be possible—and I believe one is possible—which will be a real remedy for the ills and the evils which afflict the people of the United States, instead of the sham which the pending bill will turn out to be.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I shall, notwithstanding the embarrassment which a motion of this sort creates, vote to refer the bill and the various amendments to the Judiciary Committee, and I do it not as an enemy of some bill which may be properly framed to meet the evil complained of, but I do it because I believe there is in the bill nothing at all which will meet the evil complained of. The people who are suffering from the unlawful acts of associated corporations are asking relief, and when they ask for bread the Senator from Ohio proposes to give them a stone; when they ask for fish he proposes to give them a serpent. As the author of this bill he has been, first and last, something over a year in bringing forward his experiments to meet the evil, and constantly revising his own impressions as to the method in which it could be done, until I venture to say the last proposition is the least effective of any one that he has made.

I allude to this, as I do to the fact that five amendments have been presented, and I believe presented in good faith, to this bill, to show the very great difficulty which surrounds the subject. There is not a single member of the Senate who has thought upon this subject who does not recognize that it is one full of difficulty, of legal difficulty, of constitutional difficulty. The very fact that these amendments have been offered proves the difficulty of the situation, and proves, not that Senators are opposed to granting relief from the ills which are complained of, but that they desire to grant efficient relief if they attempt to grant relief at all.

It is no answer to the criticisms which are made on this bill to decalaim against the enormities of trusts and combinations. It is no answer to the objection which is made to this bill, that it will not touch any single trust or combination in this country, to denounce the operations of trusts. It will not do to say that a person who is not ready to vote for this bill wants to perpetuate the illegal and injurious acts of combinations and associations and trusts. We are very often as legislators placed in this dilemma: An evil exists, an evil which ought to be remedied, which ought to be remedied in an efficient, legal, and constitutional way, and some measure is proposed which either does not remedy it at all or runs against every constitutional method of reaching it; and then the persons who are not ready to take that measure are held up as being opposed to rendering any relief whatever.

My objection to this bill, which I have already stated, is that it will not touch or reach the unlawful or injurious acts of any trust, association, or combination, whether of individuals or corporations, in this country. The fact that it is confined to arrangements between persons or corporations residing in different States of the Union or residing in this country and in foreign countries, is an admission on the face of it that the author of the bill or the amendment admits his inability to do anything else in this direction. It is an admission on the part of the author of the bill that all trusts, all combinations, all agreements, all associations existing between people of the same State, between corporations of the same State, for the unlawful purposes which we all understand, are beyond the reach of Congressional action.

That is the admission in this bill. It is an admission which I do not make, but it is an admission of this bill, because it is confined simply to those arrangements, associations, combinations, and trusts existing between persons of different States or corporations of different States or persons of this country and another country or corporations of this country and another country. So having eliminated from the effect of the bill all the great combinations which have been formed and may be formed within States it proposes to deal with them where the parties composing them reside in different States; that, and that only.

If we could do that we should simply transfer the parties who compose these corporations from different States to a single State. The great sugar trust, if it is now a combination existing between corporations in different States, would organize as a single corporation of a single State, and then would be beyond the reach of this bill.

But that is not the real difficulty. The real difficulty is that under the Constitution of the United States you can not reach an agreement made between parties residing in different States, no matter for what purpose. It is the controversies arising between persons residing in different States, between corporations residing in different States, which can be reached in the courts of the United States.

The Senator from Ohio seems entirely unable to comprehend this distinction—but it is a distinction which, as it seems to me, every lawyer ought to comprehend—that he is not providing for controversies between persons residing in different States and corporations of different States, but he is trying to stop agreements between persons of different States and corporations of different States, under that clause of the Constitution which gives the courts of the United States jurisdiction of controversies arising between persons so residing. I believe that I can understand the difference between a controversy and an agreement. It is not claimed (at least I have not heard it claimed by the honorable and able Senator from Ohio) that he reaches these combinations under any provision of the Constitution except that which confers jurisdiction upon the United States courts in controversies arising between citizens of different States. If that be true, then every particle of meat, every particle of efficiency, every particle of force in this bill disappears.

I am not to be told that because I am not willing to stand here and vote for a bill which is a snare and a delusion I am not therefore willing to do all in my power to put down these unlawful acts which are ruining the business and injuring the people of the country.

I think it highly appropriate that the bill should be referred to the Judiciary Committee, and it is no answer to that proposition to suggest, as the Senator from Alabama has done, that it is to be referred to a committee several of whose members are enemies of the bill. Any lawyer ought to be, not an enemy of the bill, but opposed to the bill, if he desires to do anything to remedy the evils which have been complained of.

How far the bill may represent the matured judgment of the Finance Committee we are not informed. Certainly one Senator upon the Finance Committee, and an able lawyer, has expressed his dissent from the bill. The other members of the Finance Committee, with the exception of the Senator from Ohio, have not spoken; but I apprehend that when they come to speak by their vote on the bill it will be seen that the bill represents, not a majority, but a decided minority of the Finance Committee.

I do not vote to refer the bill in any spirit of criticism of the Finance Committee, but I vote to refer it by reason of the difficulty of the subject, by reason of the honest doubts of Senators as to the method of relief proposed in the bill and the power of Congress to exercise such relief, because of the earnest desire on the part of members of the Senate to enact some legislation which shall be effectual. I think it ought to be referred to that committee which by common consent embraces the largest amount of judicial ability in the Senate; and to say that it is to be smothered there is to attack and impugn the motives of the honorable gentlemen who compose that committee. I have every confidence that that committee will deal with the subject; that if there is a constitutional way of reaching this difficulty, of remedying these evils, of punishing the men and the corporations who are engaged in these unlawful conspiracies and acts, it will be found out by that committee, and a bill framed along that line; and if there is none that they will say in their opinion there is none; and if that be true we had better face that proposition now than to deal in what in my judgment will be found, if this bill shall pass, to be nothing more nor less than a humbugging of the people of the United States.

I do not use that language imputing to the author of the bill or to any one who may vote for it a desire to humbug the people of the United States, but in my judgment, after having given this matter careful attention and careful thought for two or three years' time, if we pass this bill we shall show the people of the United States who desire to have these evils remedied that we have passed a bill which is utterly powerless and inefficient to reach the evils, and then they will say that they have been humbugged, and they will say more than that, which will not be true, however, that they have been intentionally humbugged by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. WASHBURN. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut if he thinks it is possible for him or anybody else to draw a bill that will be efficient in this respect.

Mr. PLATT. That is precisely the question which I desire to refer to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WASHBURN. I ask what the Senator's opinion is.

Mr. PLATT. I believe that a bill can be framed along certain lines which may partially reach this evil, but I am not prepared to indicate precisely the extent and the scope of the bill. There may be in some of these amendments valuable suggestions in that line.

Mr. WASHBURN. I should like to ask the Senator also if any special harm would come to the country or anybody else by the passage of the bill if it should be afterwards held to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States. Would any damage be done to anybody?

Mr. PLATT. I pointed out one damage. Whenever Congress passes a bill which the concurrent sentiment of Congress believes to be unconstitutional it does a greater damage to the people of this country than is well to be calculated.

Mr. WASHBURN. I do not see how we are ever going to know whether this bill is constitutional or not until it has been referred to the Supreme Court. The most eminent lawyers in this Chamber differ in opinion, and it seems to me that we shall never reach any definite result until some law goes to the Supreme Court.

So far as I am concerned I know the sentiment of the country with regard to the question of monopolies and trusts, and I believe the people expect the Congress of the United States to make an attempt to secure some valid and satisfactory legislation. While the bill of the Senator from Ohio may not be perfect, while it may not reach every point, and may finally be declared unconstitutional, yet it is a move in the right direction, and for one I should dislike very much to have it sent to the Committee on the Judiciary, which would be sending it to "the tomb of the Capulets," I believe. I believe it would be sent there for that purpose, and I believe, furthermore, that when all other means fail to defeat a bill the constitutionality of it is usually invoked for that purpose. I hope that will not be done in this case.

Mr. DOLPH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN and others. Oh, no.

Mr. DOLPH. We are not ready for a vote. There is no prospect of reaching a vote for a week.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Oregon withdraw that motion for a moment while I submit a report?

Mr. DOLPH. I will.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall ask for the yeas and nays upon the question whenever it is put.

SENATORS FROM MONTANA.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Oregon yields to me while I submit a report, of which I gave notice yesterday, on behalf of the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the Montana case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The views of the minority will be printed with the report of the committee.

PROPOSED EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DOLPH. I renew my motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS].

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired on all subjects with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR]. As he is not in the Chamber, I withhold my vote.

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE].

Mr. SAWYER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ALLISON (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. PLATT. I desire to add to the announcement of my pair that if permitted to vote I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 29; as follows:

TRUSTS AND COMBINATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1) to declare unlawful trusts and combinations in restraint of trade and production.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, when I offered the amendment to the motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], limiting the time within which the Judiciary Committee should report back some measure, I had no idea of imputing in the slightest degree to that committee any want of activity or energy or purpose in the discharge of their public duties. I have heard it said by some Senators here that it would be impossible to get a report from that committee on this bill simply because they were not in a condition to agree about it, on account of the great diversity of opinion among them as to the proper means to accomplish the end the Senator from Ohio and the rest of us desire to accomplish. So I thought if that committee could be required to report back in twenty days it would meet the demand for urgent action, which has been postponed now for about a hundred years in the United States, as well as I understand it, on this question of monopolies and engrossing and all the other offenses against free and proper markets in our country.

The Senator from Ohio says he wants to put at rest this question. He wants to get a bill through here that will put at rest the debate and the discussion about monopolies and about trusts and the like. Well, Mr. President, if we are to have a debate here, as I suppose we are likely to have, upon the protective tariff, which is the great nursery and breeding-ground of monopolies and trusts and combinations and conspiracies, it is not likely that there will be much bating of breath upon this question, even though the Senator may get the shell of a bill through here.

This bill, offered by the Senator from Ohio and reported by the Finance Committee, is nothing but a brutum fulmen. It is a shell. It is a tub to the whale. It is not expected, I hope and believe, too, that it will ever yield any fruit in the way of checking conspiracies or combinations or forestallings or regrating or any other of the crimes against the market which the old common law furnished us with rules for defining and punishing also.

Sir, we have now a bill reported by the Committee on Finance, a substitute for a bill that the Committee on Finance had previously reported, which came within range of the batteries of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], and the bill went to pieces. Its friends had to take it back into the Committee on Finance and bring out another one; and I think from what I hear around on the different sides of the Chamber, without reference to any political divisions at all, but in reference to the opinions of men who profess to understand the Constitution and laws of the country, that the bill of the committee, as reported now, is just as likely to go down as the one that was brought in before. Including that second effort, here are six bills now before the Senate, each of them drawn by gentlemen of experience, and an account of the laborious efforts they have been making here for months, and some of them for years, in the maturing and bringing forth of these bills, is enough to startle one with the intricacy of the question.

It is an intricate question. It taxed the powers of the British Parliament with all of its omnipotence about two centuries to meet these combinations and conspiracies in trade and about trade, relating chiefly, however, to the material subsistence of the people, articles of grain and provisions and the like; and every once in awhile we find the brush of oblivion drawn by the English Parliament across all these enactments; they are all swept from the statute-books. Why? Because of the vain, futile effort on the part of legislators after all to do very much in controlling men, as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] said, in making their agreements. The common law of England has been resorted to time and again, at the end of different long periods of experiment, for the purpose of furnishing remedies for all the complaints we are now hearing about, which complaints were identical in their nature and substance with those that now come forward in vast array to tax the ingenuity of legislators to repress them. It is very certain that no Senator here, no matter what his wisdom or ability may be, can assure himself absolutely that he has a remedy which is in all respects or in many general respects a solvent and a cure for the difficulties we are now encountering.

We hear the argument made here, and I think it is a perfectly sound one, that the way to get rid of troubles in trade in the nature of conspiracies and combinations is to remove the temptation. We probably could not reach the Standard Oil conspiracy or combination, and several other various important trusts, as they are called, in the United States by a modification of our protective tariff, but it is very certain that we should reach 90 per cent. of them. We would take the underpinning entirely away from 90 per cent. of the trusts and combinations and conspiracies that are forming all over the land if we should so modify the tariff as to remove the temptation to make them; but as long as we enact these temptations in the statute-book we can hardly denounce that as immoral or criminal which men do under our invitation.

There is a great deal of danger. I think I can see it in almost every direction in legislating upon questions of this kind. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] has called attention to a very important topic in this connection. I do not know of anything that has a greater or a more direct impression upon our foreign commerce and our interstate commerce than the price of labor. There are combinations among our laboring men of various different fraternities continually being made for the purpose of raising the price of labor. The price of labor when raised by combination—or, if you please so to call it, by a conspiracy, or in the nature of a trust confided to the hands of some managing committee, some steering arrangement—combinations of that kind to raise the price of labor must necessarily increase the price of commodities in interstate commerce and international commerce, at least to the extent of the exports that we send abroad.

Now, while we are legislating against all such combinations and conspiracies that affect the price of commodities interchanged between the States of this Union, what are we to say to the men who, in their Knights of Labor and in their Wheels and in all of their various organizations, meet together for the very purpose of raising the price of labor in the particular industry in which they are concerned or the price of labor generally? Labor is a commodity bought and sold every hour in the day. It is so much a commodity as that we forbid its importation here when it comes under contract; we treat it just as we would spurious medicines, or base coin, or something of that sort; we tax it as we do oleomargarine. We treat labor precisely as if it were a commodity, and it is a commodity that is imported into this country.

If we pass a law here to punish men for entering into combination and conspiracy to raise the price of labor, what is the reason why we are not within the purview of the powers of Congress in respect to international commerce? Who can answer the proposition as a matter of law?

There is great danger in any direction you look in respect of such a measure as this, and I am afraid to take ground on it until that committee of this body which is charged with the consideration of judicial questions have had an opportunity to report a bill, or, if it can not agree upon a bill, to report that it can not agree. But it can agree upon certain principles that ought to control our legislation, and let us agree upon the bill, and in that way we shall be apt to come to some sedate and profitable conclusion about this great controversy, for it is a great controversy.

I think there has been as much ingenious argumentation upon this question as I have ever heard in the same length of time in the Senate of the United States, and it has taxed the abilities of almost every gentleman on this floor to find out exactly what is the extent and boundary of our power and what are the lawful methods by which we can put it into exercise in the Federal courts. It is a very intricate subject, and, in my judgment, we are going entirely too fast if we do not get the opinion of our Judiciary Committee upon it.

There is a feature in this case that nobody has ever suggested, so far as I have heard, that has always struck me with a good deal of force. I think a proceeding in rem can be had under a libel for condemnation of goods, wares, and merchandise carried between the States, to seize, condemn, and confiscate goods that may have been manufactured under a conspiracy or bought and collected together under a conspiracy to control the markets. That subject seems not to have had any attention from Senators here. I never have proposed to myself to interfere in any way to try to make the legislation one thing or the other except so far as my mere vote would go, but it seems to me there is a field here for the enterprise of Senators.

Here is a sugar trust in New York. They say it consists of a number of corporations that are banded together, who have their local habitation in various different States; but they refine sugar under a combination that puts the price up to a certain figure and does not allow it to go any lower than that. Now, when their sugar is in transit from New York to Chicago, what is the reason why some person may not seize it under a proceeding in rem, and in that way touch the very chord that would run to the heart of the whole establishment? Why could not that be done? It seems to me that it is as easy a way to get at it as any you could mention, certainly far better than the declaration of nullity of the contract or referring some poor fellow who bought ten pounds to a Federal court somewhere to recover double damages according to the percentage of loss he sustained in the amount taxed upon him through the conspiracy.

The subject is not exhausted by any means. There is a great deal to it yet. Senators need not be in a hurry to get something on the statute-book to see if some court will not reverse what we are doing here. I trust the Senate of the United States on great questions of constitutional law affecting the jurisprudence of the United States will always be able to confine itself at least to that period of time when it has a sound and sedate judgment upon the proposition that it puts forward, especially when it is a new and a great one like this one. Unbecoming haste in a matter of this kind will recoil upon us, not merely in the laws set aside by the judgments of our tribunals, but it will recoil upon us, I am fearful, in the contempt that public opinion will have for this body. We ought to be able to interpret the Constitution of the United States or else give place to men who can do it. It is our business to do it; and I am opposed to seeing any measure go out of this body as an enactment merely as a tentative proposition or one that is experimental upon a question of constitutional law.

Here are gentlemen on both sides of this Chamber, some called State-rights men and others called Federalists; whether rightfully so denominated makes no difference. Here are gentlemen who have very strict opinions upon constitutional construction and others who are more liberal in their views. But gentlemen of both classes are objecting to this bill. They find difficulty in it. It strikes those who, like my colleague, say they are not hair-splitters, end foremost sometimes, and knocks them entirely out of position. Others it disturbs with technicalities and refinements and the like so as to disturb the pleasure of their dreams at night. There is difficulty in every direction. The unsettled opinion of Senators as expressed in this debate shows that there is difficulty in every direction; and we ought to appeal to the best organization which we have in this body to try to compose those difficulties, and get a bill back before us upon which we can agree at least on the principles of legislation, and after due effort conform our conduct to those principles.

Mr. President, I belong to what is called the State-rights school of politicians, and in season and out of season, I suppose, year after year, I stand here for the purpose of trying to protect the States of this Union against encroachment on the part of the Federal Government, because I believe that is one of the greatest duties of a Senator, and especially of a Democrat. I think it is a life-long task a man takes upon himself when he joins the Democratic party to try to protect the States in their autonomy and in their rights secured under the Constitution against Congressional encroachment. But, sir, in respect of this matter concerning trusts and combinations and conspiracies, I must say that I think the States are utterly derelict. They have the unquestioned power to handle and to punish every one of these conspiracies and combinations.

Why they do not do it is more than I can understand, unless I am prepared to accept the unpleasant allusion frequently made here that the Legislatures and the authorities of the State governments have not the virtue to withstand the power of the great corporations. My judgment is that to average them they are just as honest as Congress is, and as little likely to be corrupted as Congress is, and I think it is the mere lethargy of the different State governments, inspired by a too confident reliance upon the powers of Congress to remedy public evils, that is leading us to-day into this effort to do what the States themselves ought to do.

Take the cotton-seed-oil trust and take the action of the State authorities of Alabama upon that, the State in which cotton-seed oil was first produced and made an article of commerce. I remember a case in Montgomery where the great New York cotton-seed-oil trust, chartered under a New York law, I suppose, with $30,000,000 capital or alleged capital, came there and offered a certain price to a young gentleman who had himself, much by his own labor, certainly out of his own resources, built a cotton-seed-oil factory. They could not agree about the price of it. He said he did not want to sell it; that it was a business he wanted to bring his children up to; that it was a nice business; he had gotten it together and completed it himself. He had already made 10,000 barrels of oil and he shipped it down to Savannah, and thence to New York, and thence to Italy, for the purpose of having it made into a first-class article of olive oil.

When this New York combine found that his ship had arrived in New York and found the ship upon which he had freighted his 10,000 barrels of oil, they bought 10,000 barrels and put it upon the same ship and consigned it to the same city. What was the result? When they got there they sold their oil at a dollar a barrel less than he could afford to take for his. They took the market away from him and convinced him that he had no market in the business of trying to make cotton-seed oil in Alabama; that he must surrender his possessions into the hands of these men; and they bought him out and turned him adrift. Now, the State of Alabama ought to have punished that. It should have made a condign example of the men who did that thing, who came there and threatened that they would destroy his business unless he would sell to them.

Mr. SHERMAN. How could the authorities of Alabama punish the combination in New York?

Mr. MORGAN. When they came to Alabama and made a proposition to him that unless he sold out they would establish their business and break him up they committed an offense against the laws of Alabama.

Mr. SHERMAN. They probably sent some poor clerk down there to make that declaration.

Mr. MORGAN. Suppose they did. Probably he would have better sense the next time if he served a short term in the penitentiary for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; all that Alabama could do would be to take the clerk and send him to the penitentiary.

Mr. MORGAN. It may be so, and we shall not get anybody but clerks practically out of this measure that the Senator from Ohio has put in here. All the big fish will escape. The little fish are the men who will have the trouble. There will not be a suit brought in twenty-five years to come under the bill of the Senator from Ohio, if it becomes a law. What does a man get? Double damages. For what? The enhanced price that he has to pay for a commodity in the market. You would never trace it back to them in the world. You have got to identify the sugar, or the molasses, or whatever it is, and run it back to the manufacturer or to the refiner and prove the conspiracy. There would not be a recovery in twenty-five years, and it is not expected that there would be. This bill does not contemplate such a thing. This bill is a good preface to an argument upon the protective tariff when that comes up: "We have sunk the trust question out of sight by a bill that has smothered it for the present."

Mr. SHERMAN. Why could not the Senator's friend in Alabama sue the combination in the courts of the United States and make them pay for all the damages he suffered?

Mr. MORGAN. In the courts of the United States?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly, why not? Why could not your citizens, whom you describe so pathetically, sue in the Federal court under this bill?

Mr. MORGAN. He would find, as everybody else would find under the bill of the Senator, that it is cheaper not to sue. It is not a pleasant thing to have a lawsuit.

The Legislature of Alabama ought to have a law upon her statute-book now punishing that particular sort of conspiracy with imprisonment in the penitentiary. Whenever they reform their laws and put their machinery in operation to do justice to their own people, their people will not be here clamoring for Congress to stretch its powers inordinately to give them relief. That is what I am talking about, and as a State-rights man I say that the States are not doing their duty in this particular, and we ought to so inform them. Let them strike out on that line and protect their people, as they have a perfect right to do, and we shall hear no more about trusts and combinations and conspiracies.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, I never have a bill in which I feel any interest referred to this grand mausoleum of Senatorial literature, the Judiciary Committee, without feeling that I have attended a funeral. This occasion is no exception to that feeling. The grand air of magisterial dominion which surrounds those gentlemen who constitute that committee, the awful profundity and gravity with which they are enveloped, naturally tend to produce a funereal impression upon a serious mind, and the whole atmosphere seems to me resonant with the strains of that familiar old hymn:

Hark! from the tombs a doleful sound;
Mine ears attend the cry.
Come, living men, and view the ground
Where your bills must shortly lie.

[Laughter.]

I recollect very well when a bill was passed through this body forbidding the employment of any Senator or Representative as counsel for any railroad which had been subsidized by the Government. We all thought it was a mighty good bill and a mighty proper one, and so thought the Senate; but a motion to reconsider was made. The question was discussed, and it was finally proposed to refer it to the Judiciary Committee. On that occasion I bade my friend farewell. I was promised, however, that it should come back. It did come back, but, alas, it did not come back in the same body in which it went. It was Greece, but living Greece no more. It came back mangled and mutilated until its parent knew it not and disclaimed its paternity. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I feel an interest in this bill. I feel that one class of the community in this American country of ours has not partaken of the general prosperity which the country has enjoyed for the last twenty years. A step has been taken to remove some of the obstructions to this prosperity which a portion of our fellow-citizens fail to enjoy. It may not be the proper step; there may be a better step, but it is a beginning, at all events.

Mr. President, I think if it were not so late in the evening and the Senate would give me its patient attention that I could demonstrate the fact that if a man desired to go to any given point he must start, and that he never would get there until after he did start, and my opinion is that we never shall get a bill for the suppression of the trusts and combinations which oppress a large portion of the American people so long as we consign all of our bantlings to the fostering care of the Judiciary Committee. I say it with all due respect to that great committee, of course. I am a man too cautious of my personal safety to desire to do anything that would bring upon me the enmity or the disregard of that august body. [Laughter.]

So, if it is the determination of the Senate to send this bill to the Judiciary Committee, to deliver the child for nurture to the persons having most interest in its death, I shall have sorrowfully to submit myself to that state of things, but I hope I may be pardoned for saying that I feel a good deal as we are given to understand the Apostle Paul felt when he took leave of the elders at Ephesus. Having told them that he should depart from them never more to return, the record says:

They all wept sore and fell on Paul's neck, sorrowing most of all for the words which he spake, that they should see his face no more.

I am satisfied, sir, that when this bill does come back it will be so mutilated, that it will have everything that can possibly be of any benefit to the people of this country so entirely eliminated and eradicated, that it will for practical purposes not be worth the paper that it is written upon, and the country will so accept it. The country knows the receptacles where we deposit our dead by this time. We can no longer hope to conceal them.

I heard of a Senator who once occupied a seat in this body who boasted that he was no milk-and-cider man, that he was a man of decision on all subjects. Said he, "When a question comes up before me I either vote for it or I vote against it, or I squat like a man." [Laughter.] Mr. President, the country has found out that when we desire the death of a bill and are not particularly anxious to put ourselves on record as having directly struck the blow which caused the demise, we refer it to the Judiciary Committee [laughter], where it sleeps the last sleep known to the literature of this Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the Senate ready for the question? The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to the motion made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] to commit the bill to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. GEORGE. I will accept the amendment if I have a right to do so.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REAGAN. What is the question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion made by the Senator from Mississippi to commit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions.

Mr. REAGAN. I believe the Senator from Mississippi accepted the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He did.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the pending question be now stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair omitted to state that the amendment was instructing the committee to report within twenty days. The roll will be called.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIXON (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON], who was unavoidably called from the Chamber this afternoon. He said he would vote in favor of referring this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary. I am of the same opinion, and therefore I shall vote "yea."

Mr. DOLPH (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN]. I do not know how he would vote on this subject, and I withhold my vote. I should vote against the motion to refer if I was at liberty to vote.

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS].

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. If agreeable to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] I suggest that he and I transfer our pairs, so as to pair the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], and then the Senator from West Virginia and I can both vote.

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE]. I do not know how he would vote on this question. I should vote "yea," if he were present.

Mr. VANCE (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. McMILLAN], who is not here. I should vote "nay," if he were present.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to say that if the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS], with whom I am paired, were present, I should vote "nay" upon the proposition.

Mr. KENNA. I am paired on all questions, except the Blair bill, with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. CASEY].

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—15.

Bate, Blackburn, Dixon, George,	Gray, Hawley, Higgins, Hiscock,	Jones of Arkansas, Payne, Stewart, Teller,	Vest, Walthall, Wilson of Md.
--	--	---	-------------------------------------

NAYS—23.

Allen, Allison, Berry, Blair, Cockrell, Coke, Cullom,	Davis, Dawes, Frye, Gorman, Hale, Harris, Hoar,	Ingalls, McPherson, Manderson, Mitchell, Moody, Morrill, Pierce,	Plumb, Pugh, Reagan, Sherman, Turpie, Washburn, Wilson of Iowa.

ABSENT—30.

Aldrich, Barbour, Beck, Blodgett, Brown, Butler, Call, Cameron, Casey, Chandler,	Colquitt, Daniel, Dolph, Edmunds, Eustis, Evarts, Farwell, Faulkner, Gibson, Hampton,	Hearst, Jones of Nevada, Kenna, McMillan, Morgan, Paddock, Pasco, Pettigrew, Platt, Quay,	Ransom, Sawyer, Spooner, Squire, Stanford, Stockbridge, Vance, Voorhees, Wolcott.
---	--	--	---

So the motion to refer was not agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. What is now the pending question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. HOAR. I inquire if that be an amendment to the entire bill, a substitute.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not.

Mr. HOAR. I do not care about having it read at length, but I wished to know whether it was a substitute or not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is an amendment adding new sections to the original bill or to the substitute for the original bill. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. SHERMAN. We had better have the yeas and nays.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the state of the question. Is the amendment of the Senator from Texas offered as a substitute for the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Texas, as the Chair understands, is an amendment to the so-called substitute of the Committee on Finance for the original bill.

Mr. GEORGE. And not a substitute for it?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Not a substitute for the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is an addition to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the Chair correct in that understanding?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, that was so stated.

Mr. SPOONER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry which I rather wish to address to the Senator from Texas. Is it not the intention of his amendment to take the place of the substitute reported by the Committee on Finance?

Mr. REAGAN. It is an amendment in addition to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to hear the question stated. There is so much confusion that I do not know what the question is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will again state his understanding of the question before the Senate. It is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to the substitute agreed upon for the original bill, adding new sections to the substitute accepted for the original bill.

It is not in any sense a substitute for the original bill, but an amendment to the substitute which was accepted in place of the original bill.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIXON (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON], who is unavoidably absent from the Chamber.

Mr. DOLPH (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN]. As I do not know how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote in the affirmative.

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I transfer the pair I have with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] to the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] and vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS].

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SAWYER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. VANCE (when his name was called). I withhold my vote in consequence of the pair which I have already announced.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. RANSOM. I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. VANCE. I transfer the pair which I have with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. McMILLAN] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS], and I desire to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. PADDOCK. In accordance with the arrangement for the transfer of the pair of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] announced by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE], I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—34.

Allen, Allison, Bate, Berry, Blackburn, Cockrell, Coke, Cullom, Davis,	Faulkner, George, Gorman, Gray, Harris, Hawley, Higgins, Ingalls, Jones of Arkansas, Teller,	Manderson, Moody, Paddock, Payne, Pierce, Pugh, Reagan, Spooner, Teller,	Turpie, Vance, Vest, Walthall, Washburn, Wilson of Iowa, Wilson of Md.
--	---	--	--

NAYS—12.

Aldrich, Blair, Dawes,	Frye, Hiscock, Hoar,	McPherson, Mitchell, Morrill,	Plumb, Sherman, Stewart.

ABSENT—30.

Barbour, Beck, Blodgett, Brown, Butler, Call, Cameron, Casey, Chandler,	Colquitt, Daniel, Dixon, Dolph, Edmunds, Eustis, Evarts, Farwell, Gibson,	Hale, Hampton, Hearst, Jones of Nevada, Kenna, McMillan, Morgan, Pasco, Pettigrew,	Platt, Quay, Ransom, Sawyer, Squire, Stanford, Stockbridge, Voorhees, Wolcott.
---	---	--	--

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I offer a proviso at the end of the first section of the bill reported by the Committee on Finance. I take this proviso from the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. I do not think it necessary, but, at the same time to avoid any confusion, I submit it to come in at the end of the first section.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add the following proviso to section 1:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to apply to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations between laborers made with the view of lessening the number of hours of labor or of increasing their wages; nor to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations among persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture made with the view of enhancing the price of agricultural or horticultural products.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me suggest to the Senator from Ohio that the word "their" should come in there, so that the limitation should be upon the exercise of the combination concerning their own products and nobody else's. The point is, if that is carried out, the provisions of the bill would not apply to a person who happened to own a ten-acre tract of land who is engaged in horticulture or agriculture.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the Senator look at the amendment and see where he will insert his modification. I took the proposition from the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read Mr. SHERMAN'S amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. Insert the word "their" before "agricultural."

Mr. SHERMAN. The word "their" ought to be inserted before "labor" and also before "agricultural."

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that he add there something about associations as well as combinations.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think those words describe the arrangement.

Mr. TURPIE. I think the amendment would be still clearer by inserting the word "own" after "their;" so as to read "their own."

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, and inserting "associations," because that is what they are.

Mr. BLAIR. Would the Senator have any objection, also, to inserting words which would include those engaged in the cod-fisheries and the manufacture of boots and shoes? There is a good deal of that done up in New England. We do not raise a great deal of wheat and corn, but we do catch cod-fish; and there is a good deal done in my State in the boot and shoe business, and I am afraid, if we except those engaged in production out West, and I vote for that and do not include in the exception those manufacturing boots and shoes in New Hampshire, I shall get beaten next fall and never come back to the Senate again. [Laughter.] Down in Massachusetts they are in the cod-fish business, and I think the Senator from Massachusetts ought to look after that.

Mr. COKE. If in order, I will now offer the amendment I had proposed, which has been printed.

Mr. REAGAN. Before my colleague offers his amendment let us dispose of amendments to perfect the text. Is my colleague's amendment offered as an addition to the bill?

Mr. COKE. I offer mine as a substitute.

Mr. REAGAN. Before that is offered I desire to move an amendment to the second section of the original bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a pending amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], which will be read again as modified:

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to apply to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations between laborers, made with the view of lessening the number of hours of their labor or of increasing their wages; nor to any arrangements, agreements, associations, or combinations among persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture, made with a view of enhancing the price of their own agricultural or horticultural products.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio whether he understands by this language agricultural products would include wool. They have, I believe, a wool-growing association—

Mr. BLAIR. There are not many sheep in Connecticut.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it would include their own wool. [Laughter.]

Mr. PLATT. They have a wool-growers' association in Ohio which we have heard at times a great deal of, and I would suggest to the Senator from Ohio that when we are excepting certain classes of people from the effect of this bill it may be that when the bill comes to be enforced the wool-growers' association of Ohio will inquire why they were not included within the exception.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the Senate ready for the question on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio? ["Vote!" "Vote!"]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to offer an amendment in line 4 of section 2 of the committee's bill. After "United States" I wish to add the words "or any State," and then in the next line to strike out the words "without respect to the amount involved;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That any person or corporation injured or damaged by such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination defined in the first section of this act may sue for and recover, in any court of the United States or any State of competent jurisdiction, of any person or corporation a party to a combination described in the first section of this act, twice the amount of damages sustained and the costs of the suit, together with a reasonable attorney's fee.

The object is, in the first place, to give concurrent jurisdiction to the State courts in civil suits; of course in criminal prosecutions that could not be done; and to that end it would be proper to strike out the words "without respect to the amount involved," because the law of the United States and of the States would fix the jurisdictional amount, and those words would not be necessary.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the amendment be read from the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Texas will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 4, after "United States," it is proposed to insert the words "or any State," and, in line 5, to strike out the words "without respect to the amount involved;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That any person or corporation injured or damaged by such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination defined in the first section of this act may sue for and recover, in any court of the United States or any State of competent jurisdiction, of any person or corporation a party to a combination described in the first section of this act, twice the amount of damages sustained and the costs of the suit, together with a reasonable attorney's fee.

Mr. SHERMAN. Those words were inserted with a view to giving a remedy to persons who had suffered in a minor degree. The jurisdictional amount in the courts of the United States is a pretty large sum; I understand $2,000 is the minimum, and it seemed to the Committee on Finance when this was inserted that to limit the jurisdiction to cases of $2,000 or over that amount would be to close the courts to most suitors. However, it is for the Senate to decide.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the amendment?

Mr. REAGAN. I could not hear what the Senator from Ohio said.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate agree to the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN]?

Mr. SAWYER. What is the amendment?

Mr. TELLER. Let it be again reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Texas will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. REAGAN.

Mr. TELLER. It strikes me that the words proposed to be stricken out are most desirable to be retained. We want to give the United States courts jurisdiction without reference to the amount involved. It is the subject-matter simply that we want the court to have jurisdiction of, and not the amount, and if we limit the amount there is not one man out of a hundred who are damaged who will ever have an opportunity of getting redress. It may be that there will not be a case prosecuted where there is a large amount of damage. It is to be presumed that there may be cases gotten up for the purpose of trying to abate what appears to be a sort of public nuisance. I think we had better let the parties go into court on any amount. If they are damaged by these proceedings which we are about to declare illegal, they ought to be allowed to sue, no matter what the amount of damage may be. I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, this is the old question which has been so frequently before Congress and before the Senate, where it is attempted to give State courts of all descriptions concurrent jurisdiction with the United States courts over remedies provided by United States statutes. It has, I think, never been done in Congress, though it has been often attempted. The result of it is to give every court in the United States, certainly every court that is a court of record, and justices of the peace, if they are courts of record, jurisdiction over remedies prescribed by United States statutes. I am opposed to it, as I have been in every case in which it has been attempted before Congress.

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose the amendment would amount to this: That the statute creates a cause of action under certain circumstances, and, that being the case, it gives the right to assert that cause of action in any court of competent jurisdiction. It is not a question of whether the amount involved or the person suing is the jurisdictional test, but the creation by statute of the universal right of action under certain circumstances, which can be enforced in any court of competent jurisdiction, State or national, especially if the jurisdiction of the national court is not made exclusive by the terms of the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. There are a number of statutes which I can not refer to now, but I have referred to them heretofore, saying, in effect, that there are a number of subjects in which civil suits under United States authority may be maintained in the State courts.

Mr. HOAR. Cases of suits against national banks, for example.

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir, and a number of other subjects; so that I do not think there is any question about that. My reason for presenting this amendment is that under the original bill persons of moderate means would not be able to go into the Federal courts and employ lawyers and take witnesses there and prosecute suits, so that, while the bill would nominally afford a remedy for the evils, it would really be no remedy at all for the great class of persons who might be injured by the sort of things we are legislating against.

If the law is to be efficient to give a remedy, it seems to me it ought to be put in courts that will be accessible to litigants and as cheaply accessible to the litigants as we can make them. If, as suggested by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], there is objection to striking out the words in the fifth line, I have no particular choice about that. I thought, perhaps, it would be safest to let the laws of the United States and of the States fix the jurisdictional amount, but if it is thought better that that part should stand as it is in the committee's bill, I have no objection. If any one objects, I will limit the amendment to the first part which I have proposed.

Mr. SPOONER. Let the amendment be again reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 4 of section 2, after "United States," it is proposed to insert "or any State;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That any person or corporation injured or damaged by such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination defined in the first section of this act may sue for and recover in any court of the United States or any State of competent jurisdiction without respect to the amount involved.

Mr. TELLER. I have no objection to the attempt to confer upon the State courts authority to hear these cases. Of course, that will depend upon what the State says about it. What I objected to was the provision striking out the words "without respect to the amount involved," in line 5.

Mr. SHERMAN. That part of the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. TELLER. I was under the impression that the present statutes which require that there shall be a certain amount involved to give jurisdiction might be invoked against these claimants, and I think it would; but, if that is withdrawn, I have no objection to the rest of the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] as modified. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I move now to strike out, beginning in line 4 of section 1 of the committee's substitute, from the word "corporations," at the end of that line, down to the word "thereof," in line 7, so that the bill will then punish these illegal combinations whether they are in the same State or in different States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 4 of section 1, after the word "corporations," it is proposed to strike out all down to and including the word "thereof," in line 7, as follows:

Or both, of different States, or between two or more citizens or corporations, or both, of the United States and foreign states, or citizens or corporations thereof.

So as to read—

Mr. HOAR. Before the Secretary proceeds to read, I wish to say that the words "or both" should not be included in the language to be stricken out. The amendment should begin with the words "of different States," in the fifth line.

The CHIEF CLERK. So as to read:

That all arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between two or more citizens or corporations, or both, made with a view or which tend to prevent full and free competition in the importation, transportation, or sale of articles imported into the United States, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. What became of the amendment I offered some time since?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment next in order is the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill as new sections the following:

That for the purposes of this act the word "options" shall be understood to mean any contract or agreement whereby a party thereto, or any person, corporation, partnership, or association, for whom or in whose behalf such contract or agreement is made, acquires the right or privilege, but is not thereby obligated, to deliver to another at a future time or period any of the articles mentioned in section 3 of this act.

Sec. — That for the purposes of this act the word "futures" shall be understood to mean any contract or agreement whereby a party agrees to sell and deliver at a future time to another any of the articles mentioned in section 3 of this act, when at the time of making such contract or agreement the party so agreeing to make such delivery, or the party for whom he acts as agent, broker, or employé in making such contract or agreement, is not at the time of making the same the owner of the article so contracted and agreed to be delivered.

Sec. — That the articles to which the foregoing sections relate are wheat, corn, oats, rye, barley, cotton, and all other farm products; also, beef, pork, lard, and all other hog and cattle products.

Mr. INGALLS. In section 4, after the first word "That," I ask leave to modify the amendment by inserting the following words:

For the purpose of preventing and suppressing, as far as may be, the dealing in options and futures as herein defined.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). The section will be read as modified by the Senator from Kansas.

The Chief Clerk read section 4 as modified, as follows:

Sec. — That, for the purpose of preventing and suppressing, as far as may be, the dealing in options and futures as herein defined, special taxes are imposed as follows: Dealers in "options" or "futures" shall pay annually the sum of $1,000, and shall also pay the further sum of 5 cents per pound for each and every pound of cotton, or of beef, pork, lard, or other hog and cattle products, and the sum of 30 cents per bushel for each and every bushel of any of the articles mentioned in section 3 of this act, the right or privilege of delivering which may be acquired under any "options" contract or agreement, as defined by section 1 of this act, or which may be sold to be delivered at a future time or period under any "futures" contract or agreement as defined in section 2 of this act, which said amounts shall be paid to the collector of internal revenue, as hereinafter provided, and by him accounted for, as required in respect to other special taxes collected by him. Every person, association, copartnership, or corporation who shall, in their own behalf or as broker, agent, or employé of another, deal in "options," or make any "options" contract or agreement, as hereinafter defined, shall be deemed a dealer in "options," and every person, association, copartnership, or corporation who shall, in their own behalf or as broker, agent, or employé of another, deal in "futures" or make any "futures" contract or agreement, as hereinafter defined, shall be deemed a dealer in "futures."

Mr. HOAR. I desire to inquire whether any Senator asked for the reading of this amendment in full. As it has been read more than once, I do not believe that it is necessary to read it through again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair is not aware whether it has been heretofore read.

Mr. PADDOCK. It has been read at length before.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that the Chair ask for unanimous consent that its further reading may be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If no further reading of the amendment be called for it will be dispensed with.

The remaining sections of the amendment are as follows:

Sec. — That every person, association, copartnership, or corporation engaged in, or proposing to engage in, the business of dealer in "options" or of dealer in "futures," as hereinafter defined, shall, before commencing such business or making any such "options" or "futures" contract or agreement, make application in writing to the collector of internal revenue for the district in which he proposes to engage in such business or make such contract or agreement, setting forth the name of the person, association, partnership, or corporation, place of residence of the applicant, the business engaged in, and where such business is to be carried on, and, in case of partnership, association, or corporation, the names and places or residence of the several persons constituting the same, and shall thereupon pay to such collector the sum aforesaid of $1,000, and shall also execute and deliver to such collector a bond in the penal sum of $50,000 with two or more sureties satisfactory to the collector, conditioned upon the full and faithful compliance by the obligor therein with all the requirements of this act. And thereupon the collector shall issue to such applicant a certificate in such form as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall prescribe, that such applicant is authorized for the period of one year from the date of such certificate to be a dealer in "options" or "futures" and to make "options" or "futures" contracts or agreements as hereinafter defined; and for the period specified in such certificate the party to whom it is issued may conduct the business of dealer as aforesaid. Such certificate may be renewed annually upon the compliance with the provisions of this act, and any "options" or "futures" contract or agreement as defined by this act shall be absolutely void as between the parties thereto and their respective assigns unless the party making such contract or agreement shall have at the time of making the same a certificate as aforesaid authorizing the making thereof.

Sec. — That it shall be the duty of the collector to keep in his office a register containing a copy of each and every application made to him under the foregoing section and a statement in connection therewith as to whether a certificate has been issued thereon and for what period, which book or register shall be a public record and be subject to inspection of any and all persons desiring to examine the same.

Sec. — That every "option" or "futures" contract or agreement as hereinafter defined shall be in writing and signed in duplicate by the parties making the same; and any such contract or agreement not so made and signed shall, as between the parties thereto and their assigns, be absolutely void.

Sec. — That it shall be the duty of every person, copartnership, association, or corporation, on the first day of the week next succeeding the date of the certificate issued to them, and on the first day of each and every week thereafter, to make to the collector of the district in which any "options" or "futures" contract or agreement has been made full and complete return and report under oath of any and all such contracts or agreements made or entered into by such person, copartnership, association, or corporation during the previous week, together with a statement of the article or articles embraced in or covered by such contracts or agreements, and the amounts, respectively, of each, and the name of the party or parties with whom such contracts or agreements have been made, and at the same time to pay to such collector the amount of the tax hereinafter required of 5 cents per pound on each and every pound of cotton and of beef, pork, lard, or other hog and cattle products, and of 30 cents per bushel on each and every bushel of any of the other articles mentioned in section 3 of this act, which are the subject of or covered by such contracts or agreements, or any of them, for which sums such collector shall give his receipt to the party so paying, and the sums so collected shall be accounted for by the collector as provided by law in respect to other taxes collected by him.

Sec. — That every person who shall in his own behalf, or in behalf of any other person, association, partnership, or corporation, enter into any "options" or "futures" contract or agreement as defined by this act without having a certificate of authority from the collector as hereinafter provided, and covering the time at which such contract or agreement shall be made, shall, besides being liable for the amounts prescribed in section 4 of this act, be fined not less than $5,000 and not more than $10,000 for each and every such offense. And every person who shall make to the collector a false or fraudulent return or report required by section 8 of this act shall be subject to a fine of not less than $5,000 nor more than $10,000, or to imprisonment for not less than six months or more than two years, or to both such fine and imprisonment.

Sec. — That neither the payment of the taxes required nor the certificate issued by the collector under this act shall be held to legalize dealing in options and futures, nor to exempt any person, association, copartnership, or corporation from any penalty or punishment now or hereafter provided by the laws of any State for making contracts or agreements such as are hereinafter defined as "options" or "futures" contracts or agreements, or in any manner to authorize the making of such contracts or agreements within any State or locality contrary to the laws of such State or locality; nor shall the payment of the taxes imposed by this act be held to prohibit any State or municipality from placing a tax or duty on the same trade, transaction, or business for State, municipal, or other purposes.

Sec. — That section 3309 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is, so far as applicable, made to extend and apply to the taxes imposed by this act and to the persons upon whom they are imposed.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas whether it would not be best to insert in the second section:

Provided, That this shall not apply to contracts or agreements for articles less than $50 in value to be delivered at one time.

Literally construed, this section would prohibit a man's grocer from engaging to deliver any farm product or articles in common family use. It seems to me there should be some limit in amount. I will suggest an amendment in these words:

Provided, That this act shall not apply to contracts for the delivery at any one time of articles less than $50 in value.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 2 the following proviso:

Provided, That this act shall not apply to contracts for the delivery at any one time of articles less than $50 in value.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This amendment to the amendment will be considered adopted unless objection is made. The Chair hears no objection. The question now is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I am inclined to ask that the bill as amended may be printed and that the Senate either go into executive session or adjourn, and let us see in the morning exactly what form the bill is in. I ask that it be printed in bill form with the amendments.

Mr. FRYE. If we do that the debate will last three days longer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator make any motion?

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust not. I hope we shall remain and pass the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further amendments to the bill as in Committee on the Whole?

Mr. GEORGE. What became of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS]?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment was adopted.

Mr. COKE. I desire, if I can get it in the proper shape, to offer what I send to the desk as additional sections to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill the following:

That a trust is a combination of capital or skill by two or more persons, firms, or corporations for the purpose of creating or employing restrictions on trades or limiting the production, increasing or reducing the price of merchandise or commodities, or preventing competition in the making, manufacture, sale, or purchase of merchandise or commodities, or creating a monopoly in the manufacture, making, sale, or purchase of any merchandise or commodity with intent to forestall the market value of any merchandise or commodity.

Sec. — That the formation or organization of a trust within the Territories of the United States or the District of Columbia is hereby declared to be against public policy and unlawful.

Sec. — That any person acting in his own behalf or as the agent, attorney, or representative of any firm, copartnership, corporation, or any association whatsoever, who shall in any Territory or the District of Columbia aid in the organization of a trust, or who shall be a party thereto or in any manner interested therein, or who shall, after the passage of this act, knowingly aid in the business of a trust heretofore organized, or be in any way interested therein, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than five hundred nor more than ten thousand dollars.

SEC. —. That all contracts made in either of the Territories of the United States or District of Columbia by a trust, or by any person, firm, or corporation acting for a trust in furtherance of the object of such trust, or in respect of the price or sum to be paid for any commodity or merchandise controlled or handled by such trust, are hereby declared to be illegal and against public policy.

SEC. —. That when any State shall declare, or heretofore has declared by law, trusts as defined by the true intent and meaning of this act to be unlawful and against public policy, it shall not be lawful thereafter for any person, firm, or corporation to cause to be transported any product or article covered or embraced by such trust from such State to or into any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia.

SEC. —. That any common carrier or agent of any common carrier who shall knowingly receive such product or commodity for transportation from such State into another State or Territory or the District of Columbia shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than five hundred nor more than ten thousand dollars or shall be imprisoned for any period of time not less than one year or not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. And any person who shall knowingly deliver to any common carrier, or agent thereof, any such product or commodity to be transported into another State or Territory or the District of Columbia shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not less than five hundred nor more than ten thousand dollars or by imprisonment for any period of time not less than one year nor more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. —. That whenever the President of the United States shall be advised that a trust has been or is about to be organized for either of the purposes named in the first section of this act, and that a like product or commodity covered or proposed to be covered or handled by such trust, when produced out of the United States, is liable to an import duty when imported into the United States, he shall be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to suspend the operation of so much of the laws as impose a duty upon such product, commodity, or merchandise for such time as he may deem proper.

SEC. —. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the amendment lie upon the table. This amendment is entirely inconsistent with the bill as it has already been acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves that the amendment be laid on the table.

Mr. COKE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, it was my purpose—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to cut off the Senator from Texas from speaking on his own amendment. I will withdraw the motion for the present, but after he gets through I will renew the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent, the Senator from Texas will proceed.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Ohio withdraws the motion until the Senator from Texas can be heard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas will proceed.

Mr. COKE. My proposed substitute was printed several days ago and laid upon the table. I desire to say a word or two in explanation of my reasons for offering it. It was my purpose to introduce it, if I could have done so, prior to the introduction of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], because I did not wish to antagonize that amendment. This was intended as a substitute for the original bill and for any amendment which might be made to it, and I propose, if I can do so in accordance with parliamentary law, to so shape my action with reference to it as to seek to have this amendment, which I now propose, put in the place of the original bill and its amendments, except the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. As I said, I favor the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. I desire to put this measure in the place of the original bill as amended by the amendment of my colleague from Texas. How I shall do that, I am not now fully advised, but I will attempt to do it in proper parliamentary form.

This amendment contains in its first clause a definition of trusts and combinations. It contains in its second clause a declaration that such trusts and combinations are contrary to public policy and unlawful. The third clause denounces the action of persons acting in their own behalf or as agents, attorneys, or representatives of any firm, copartnership, corporation, or any association whatsoever, who shall in any Territory or the District of Columbia aid in the organization of a trust, etc., and declares that such persons shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $10,000.

In theory the amendment is operative only in the Territories and the District of Columbia until it gets to the fifth section, and that section declares:

SEC. 5. That when any State shall declare, or heretofore has declared by law, trusts as defined by the true intent and meaning of this act to be unlawful and against public policy, it shall not be lawful thereafter for any person, firm, or corporation to cause to be transported any product or article covered or embraced by such trust from such State to or into any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia.

Section 6 provides penalties for the breach of the other sections, making it a misdemeanor punishable by fine and by imprisonment in the penitentiary.

Section 7 is the section which requires the President of the United States, when advised that a trust has been or is about to be organized for either of the purposes named in the first section, to suspend the collection of import duties on articles the subject-matter of such trust.

There is no bill, there has been none before the Senate—and the bill which has already been adopted in the amended form now before the Senate is like all the others—that is not seriously doubted as to its constitutionality by the legal talent of this body.

It is demonstrable that the bill of my colleague, as well as that of the Senator from Ohio, being the original bill amended by that of my colleague, is as liable to all of the objections made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] in his argument on this subject a few days ago as was the bill then before the Senate. A brief reference to the bill of my colleague will show this. Bearing in mind that interstate commerce commences only when the product gets into the hands of the common carrier for transportation to another State and ends as soon as it reaches its destination there, I call attention to some of the provisions of the amendment submitted by my colleague. The first thing denounced is:

First. To create or carry out any restrictions in trade.

Restrictions in trade is a very general proposition. There may possibly be found some restrictions in commerce after the product has gotten into the interstate channel, but it will be extremely rare that such will be the case. Restrictions, if any, will occur almost universally before the product goes into commerce at all and when under State jurisdiction, out of the reach of Congressional legislation.

Second. To limit or reduce the production or to increase or reduce the price of merchandise or commodities.

These things must result from the production of the commodities or the suppression of their production in the States. They must occur before interstate commerce commences in the commodities, and therefore outside of and beyond the jurisdiction of Congress, and wholly under State jurisdiction.

Third. To prevent competition in the manufacture, making, purchase, sale, or transportation of merchandise, produce, or commodities.

How is competition to be prevented? Every combination must have a local habitation and a name. It must be in a State, and of course under the local jurisdiction. All the conditions denounced in that clause are things that must necessarily occur before the product gets into the channel of interstate commerce where the jurisdiction of Congress can take hold of it.

Fourth. To fix a standard or figure whereby the price to the public shall be in any manner controlled or established of any article, commodity, merchandise, produce, or commerce intended for sale, use, or consumption.

All the things forbidden in this bill are acts. They are acts which are done in a State, under State, not Congressional, jurisdiction, and are acts which are done before the products get into interstate commerce, and therefore before they come under the jurisdiction of Congress. The intention to do these things contravenes no law. The intention amounts to nothing. Although there may be goods manufactured on one bank of the Mississippi River, in St. Louis, intended to be transported for consumption across into Illinois, that intention cuts no figure whatever in the consideration of the transaction until the goods are actually put into the hands of the common carrier to be taken over the Mississippi River, and as soon as they land in the State of Illinois are again outside of Congressional jurisdiction, and under the State jurisdiction of Illinois.

You may take the bill of my colleague, you may take the bill of the Senator from Ohio, examine them and test them under the rulings of the Supreme Court which we have heard cited here, and they are clearly and, as it seems to me, grossly unconstitutional. I want a bill that will stand. I want a bill that shall not be a promise to be broken, that shall not be a delusion and a sham.

Mr. President, the bill of my colleague is infinitely better and stronger than that of the Senator from Ohio. There is greatly more force and vitality in it, and yet I challenge any man to answer the arguments which can be made against its constitutionality. If you read the different propositions contained in the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth clauses they are plausible, but will not bear analysis or close inspection.

We are all working for the same end. We are all desiring the same purpose. We all want a bill that will accomplish some good, that will relieve the people of the robbery being perpetrated on them, one that the Supreme Court will sustain; and hence we have been offering amendments and suggestions with reference to the subject.

The measure which I have offered I believe to be clear of any constitutional objection. I believe it would be sustained by the Supreme Court. It co-operates with the States, it invokes the power and authority of the States in their own behalf, and does not act upon a State except in aid of her own action.

If there is a State that has not acted, the people of that State will see that they should act in order to get the benefit of the protection of this law if it shall be passed by Congress. If they want the protection they will enact statutes on this subject.

We have all seen that Congress has not the power to deal fully with this subject. My amendment exhausts the power of Congress, and then uses all the aid the States can give in order to carry out its purpose.

Mr. BLAIR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. COKE. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator claims that his bill, or amendment, is stronger than that of his colleague. I understood him to say so.

Mr. COKE. I think so.

Mr. BLAIR. The suggestion I make is that, if the Senator says his colleague's bill is infinitely stronger than that of the Senator from Ohio, I should like to know how his can be any stronger than his colleague's.

There is another question. I should like to know whether in striking out it strikes out all but the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. If so, what, then, will become of the proviso of the Senator from Ohio, exempting the farmers from prosecution for combinations and trusts and the like?

Mr. COKE. We will not strike that out. I did not propose to strike that out.

Mr. BLAIR. I thought the line was very strictly drawn.

Mr. COKE. I say my colleague's bill is stronger than that of the Senator from Ohio. I regard the bill of the Senator from Ohio as being almost without a clause for its enforcement.

The last section of his bill reads thus:

SEC. 2. That any person or corporation injured or damaged by such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination defined in the first section of this act may sue for and recover, in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, without respect to the amount involved, of any person or corporation a party to a combination described in the first section of this act, twice the amount of damages sustained and the costs of the suit, together with a reasonable attorney's fee.

How would a citizen who has been plundered in his family consumption of sugar by the sugar trust, or in his consumption of cotton-bagging under the trust covering that indispensable article, or in his consumption of iron or steel by the iron and steel trust recover his damages under that clause? It is simply an impossible remedy offered him. The bill is as vague as the world.

Mr. BLAIR. Without form and void?

Mr. COKE. I do not believe that a recovery can be had under it. It is a wasp without a sting; it is a law without a clause for its enforcement. If the party damaged, as has been said heretofore in this debate, were a great corporation, a wealthy association, it could employ lawyers and perhaps be able to show some direct damage, but how could the consumers of the articles produced by these trusts, the great mass of our people—the individuals—go about showing the damages they had suffered?

How would they establish the damage which they had sustained so as to get a judgment under this bill? I do not believe they could do it. I do not believe it is possible to do it. I think the constituents of all of us, the consumers of products which are raised and manufactured in this country, would be absolutely without a remedy under the bill of the Senator from Ohio. The bill of my colleague is more specific and contains clauses under which it can be strictly and fully enforced if the courts should hold it constitutional. But, as I remarked before, I do not think that either of these bills is constitutional and I have offered this amendment hoping that it may be adopted. If it shall be adopted, I shall move to strike out—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator that if he desires to move to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause down to a particular line of a particular clause, and in lieu thereof to insert his amendment, the Chair thinks that would be in order.

Mr. COKE. Then I make the motion to strike out as indicated in the beginning of my remarks.

Mr. HOAR. What is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause and the amendments heretofore adopted, except that offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], and insert the amendment last read in lieu thereof.

Mr. COKE. I do not mean to strike out the proviso adopted on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the amendment lie on the table.

Mr. REAGAN. I should be glad if the Senator from Ohio would allow me to say a few words. I do not want to tax the Senate, but I should like a minute or two, and then I will yield to the Senator to renew his motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like a minute or two myself to say something on the amendment, but if I yield to the Senator from Texas I shall be compelled to yield to others. So I must insist on the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio declines to yield. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], which is to strike out all of the original bill and the amendments heretofore adopted, except that offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] and the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], and insert the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. COKE. I ask the Senator from Ohio to give us a square vote on my proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. A square vote can be had on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. COKE. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest that it is impossible to take a vote including the amendment in reference to arrangements, combinations, etc., because it comes in the middle of the original bill in such a way that it can not be touched.

Mr. HARRIS. The suggestion of the Chair is quite right, but I desire to suggest that the Senator from Texas can not exclude if he moves to strike out all of the original bill, but he may afterwards amend, if his amendment is agreed to, in the Senate, so as to insert that language.

Mr. COKE. Very well, then; I accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee, and if my motion prevails I shall move in the Senate to restore the proviso offered by the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to strike out all of the bill down to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] and insert the following—

Mr. FRYE. That has been read.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. The motion is to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. The motion is to lay the amendment on the table. The Secretary will call the roll on that motion.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIXON (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON].

Mr. DOLPH (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN]. I should vote in favor of the motion if he were present.

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] to the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], and vote "nay."

Mr. HISCOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], or I should vote "yea."

Mr. BERRY (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, was called). As stated by the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], my colleague [Mr. JONES] is paired with that Senator. My colleague would vote "nay" if present.

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SAWYER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PADDOCK. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. McMILLAN] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] by the transfer of pairs.

Mr. FRYE. My colleague [Mr. HALE] is necessarily detained from the Chamber, and is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

Mr. SAWYER. I reserved the right to vote to make a quorum. I understand a quorum has not yet voted, and I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. HISCOCK. I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] that the pair between his colleague and myself be transferred, if there is no objection.

Mr. BERRY. I have no objection to the transfer.

Mr. HISCOCK. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] to—with whom is the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] paired?

Mr. PASCO. I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL].

Mr. HISCOCK. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] and vote "yea."

Mr. PASCO. Under that arrangement I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER, Mr. CULLOM (after having voted in the affirmative). The present occupant of the chair was paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] whom he does not see present, and he will therefore withdraw his vote.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Aldrich,
Allen,
Allison,
Blair,
Chandler,
Davis,
Frye,

Hawley,
Higgins,
Hiscock,
Hoar,
McPherson,
Manderson, Mitchell,

Moody,
Morrill,
Paddock,
Pierce,
Reagan,
Sawyer, Sherman,

Spooner, Stewart,
Teller,
Washburn,
Wilson of Iowa,

Date, Berry, Blackburn, Cockrell,	Coke, Faulkner, George, Gorman,	NAYS—16.
		Harris, Pasco, Pugh, Turpie,	Vance, Vest, Walthall, Wilson of Md.
Barbour, Beck, Blodgett, Brown, Butler, Call, Cameron, Casey, Colquitt, Cullum,	Daniel, Dawson, Dixon, Dolph, Edmunds, Eustis, Everts, Farwell, Gibson, Gray,	ABSENT—40.
		Hale, Hampton, Hearst, Ingalls, Jones of Arkansas, Jones of Nevada, Kenna, McMillan, Morgan, Payne,	Pettigrew, Platt, Plumb, Quay, Ransom, Squire, Stanford, Stockbridge, Voorhees, Wolcott.

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further amendments in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I gave notice of an amendment and had it printed, which I intended to offer, but substantially the proposition of that amendment is contained in the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], and as that has been voted down I do not wish to detain the Senate by offering the amendment of which I gave notice.

Mr. STEWART. I offer an amendment to come in in section 1, line 20, after the word "articles," by inserting "or of the value of money by which such cost may be advanced or reduced."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 20, after the word "articles," it is proposed to insert:

Or of the value of money by which such cost may be advanced or reduced.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend, and give notice of a motion to amend, after the word "money," by inserting "or of gold or silver."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. What is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART]. The Secretary will again report the amendment.

Mr. PLATT. An amendment has been offered to that amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Has the Chair stated the question on my amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. STEWART. I wish to make a remark in regard to my amendment. It is offered in as good faith as anything in this bill. Every time there is a scheme to affect the price of products, the first thing that is done is for the operators to form a combination to borrow the money from the banks, lock it up, and so make money tight, and they make it a regular business in every gambling center in the United States by forming combinations of that character.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the proposed amendment, after the word "money," it is moved to insert "or of gold or silver."

Mr. HARRIS. Let the whole amendment be read, as it will be if amended as proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as proposed to be amended will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the proposed amendment, after the word "money," it is proposed to insert the words "or of gold or silver;" so that the amendment as amended will read:

Or of the value of money or of gold or silver by which such cost may be advanced or reduced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment.

Mr. STEWART. I think that confuses it. My amendment is simply directed against combinations in money for the purpose of affecting prices as part of a gambling scheme.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Nevada inform the Senate why an unlawful combination of this kind to raise the price of gold or silver is not as reprehensible as anything in this bill?

Mr. PLATT. That is already in the bill.

Mr. STEWART. But it appears that the Government by law is engaged in raising the price of gold and depressing the price of silver. You will have to make it unlawful for the United States to do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think there is any serious objection to advancing the price of silver, if we can. I should like to see both gold and silver at par with each other. I think, perhaps, that the Senator from Massachusetts would strike out silver and let it stand upon the advance of gold.

Mr. ALDRICH. A combination to decrease the price of silver, it may be.

Mr. ALLISON. Not the amendment as proposed.

Mr. ALDRICH. As I understand the proposition—

Mr. INGALLS. Let us hear it read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts is again called for.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the proposed amendment, after the word "money," it is proposed to insert "or of gold or silver," so as to read: Of the value of money or of gold or silver by which such cost may be advanced or reduced.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, it is quite evident that we can not finish this bill to-night, and I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask the Senator to yield to me to have an order made that this bill and the amendments may be printed.

Mr. TELLER. I will yield for anything of that kind.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the motion to adjourn is put, I ask unanimous consent to fix an hour to-morrow when the final vote shall be taken on this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio, who has the bill in charge, asks that an hour may be fixed to-morrow when the vote shall be taken.

Mr. INGALLS and others. Say 3 o'clock.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think it probable that the Senate is going to agree to take the final vote at any particular hour, but I was thinking of appealing to the Senator from Ohio to consent that this bill may be printed as amended, so that on to-morrow we can see exactly what we have done and how the bill stands as amended.

Mr. SHERMAN. The order to print has already been made, as I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] has asked that the bill may be printed with the amendments. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to having the bill and amendments printed, but I hope the Senate will be ready to say that at a certain hour to-morrow the debate shall close and the vote be taken.

Mr. HARRIS. So far as I am personally concerned, I shall be ready to vote at any hour to-morrow or any other day, but there are various Senators who may perhaps desire to make suggestions, and the suggestions I have heard made I have found profitable, and I am not unwilling to listen to them.

Mr. SHERMAN. I give notice, then, as I can not do anything more now, that after the morning business to-morrow I shall appeal to the Senate to finish this bill as soon as possible.

Mr. TELLER. I insist on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 26, 1890, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 25, 1890.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PURSUIT OF HOSTILE INDIANS, ETC.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message of the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

In answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 8th instant, in relation to the employment by the regular Army of the United States of Indian scouts for the purpose of pursuing hostile Indians in their raids in the territory of the United States and Mexico, and in regard to the proposed transfer of the Apache Chiricahua Indians from Mount Vernon Barracks, Alabama, to Fort Sill, Indian Territory, I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State on the subject, together with the accompanying papers.

BENJ. HARRISON.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 24, 1890.

ADDITIONAL LAND OFFICES IN MONTANA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 525) to establish two additional land offices in the State of Montana:

On page 2, line 18, after "the," insert "town."

Mr. CARTER. I move that the House concur in this amendment. The amendment was concurred in.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WADE, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for ten days, on account of sickness in his family.

HEIRS OF JOHN JONES AND OTHERS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to lay before the House a bill which was sent for by resolution of the House, having been erroneously sent to the Senate without having been passed by the House. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2239) for the relief of the heirs of John H. Jones and of the heirs of Thomas D. Harris.

The SPEAKER. The engrossed bill will now be destroyed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCook, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which concurrence was requested, the bill (H. R. 533) for the erection of a public building at Fremont, Nebr., asked a conference with the House thereon, and had appointed Mr. SPOONER, Mr. MORRILL, and Mr. VEST as conferees on the part of the Senate.

It also announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. 7496) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890, and for other purposes, disagreed to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 55, and asked a conference with the House on said bill, and had appointed Messrs. HALE, ALLISON, and COCKRELL managers at such conference on the part of the Senate.

PROPOSED WORLD'S EXPOSITION.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I call up the special order fixed for this day.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Tuesday, March 25, immediately after the approval of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration in the House of the bill (H. R. 8393) to provide for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus by holding an international exhibition of arts, industries, manufactures, and the product of the soil, mine, and sea in the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois. And that, unless previously ordered by the House, the previous question shall be deemed ordered on the engrossment, third reading, and final passage of the bill at 4 o'clock p. m. of that day.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. As will be seen, Mr. Speaker, the resolution suggests that the previous question shall be considered as ordered at 4 o'clock, unless the House shall take action at an earlier hour thereon, and the committee have concluded that they would suggest a division of the time—about three and a half hours that remain of the discussion to-day—to be divided equally, one half under the control of the chairman of the committee and the other under the control of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FLOWER], there being about an hour and three-quarters on either side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if the bill which is now presented for consideration has yet been read in the House.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. I call for the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill should be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas it is fit and appropriate that the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America be commemorated by an exhibition of the resources of the United States of America, their development, and of the progress of civilization in the New World; and

Whereas such an exhibition should be of a national and international character, so that not only the people of our Union and this continent, but those of all nations as well, can participate, and should therefore have the sanction of the Congress of the United States: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That an exhibition of arts, industries, manufactures, and products of the soil, mine, and sea shall be inaugurated in the year 1892 in the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois, as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That a commission, to consist of two commissioners from each State and Territory of the United States and from the District of Columbia and eight commissioners at large, is hereby constituted to be designated as the World's Columbian Commission.

SEC. 3. That said commissioners, two from each State and Territory, shall be appointed within thirty days from the passage of this act by the President of the United States, on the nomination of the governors of the States and Territories, respectively, and by the President eight commissioners at large and two from the District of Columbia; and in the same manner and within the same time there shall be appointed two alternate commissioners from each State and Territory of the United States and the District of Columbia and eight alternate commissioners at large, who shall assume and perform the duties of such commissioners or commissioners as may be unable to attend the meetings of the said commission; and in such nominations and appointments each of the two leading political parties shall be equally represented. Vacancies in the commission nominated by the governors of the several States and Territories, respectively, and also vacancies in the commission at large and from the District of Columbia may be filled in the same manner and under the same conditions as provided herein for their original appointment.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of State of the United States shall, immediately after the passage of this act, notify the governors of the several States and Territories, respectively, thereof and request such nominations to be made. The commissioners so appointed shall be called together by the Secretary of State of the United States in the city of Chicago, by notice to the commissioners, as soon as convenient after the appointment of said commissioners, and within thirty days thereafter. The said commissioners, at said first meeting, shall organize by the election of such officers and the appointment of such committees as they may deem expedient, and for this purpose the commissioners present at said meeting shall constitute a quorum.

SEC. 5. That said commission be empowered in its discretion to accept for the purposes of the World's Columbian Exposition such sites as may be selected and offered and such plans and specifications of buildings to be erected for such purpose at the expense of and tendered by the corporation organized under the laws of the State of Illinois, known as "The World's Exposition of 1892." Provided, That said site so tendered and the buildings proposed to be erected thereon shall be deemed by said commission adequate to the purposes of said exposition: And provided, That said commission shall be satisfied that the said corporation has an actual bona fide and valid subscription to its capital stock of at least $5,000,000, of which not less than $500,000 shall have been paid in, and that the further sum of $5,000,000, making in all $10,000,000, will be provided by said corporation in ample time for its needful use during the prosecution of the work for the complete preparation for said exposition.

SEC. 6. That the said commission shall allot space for exhibitors, prepare a classification of exhibits, determine the plan and scope of the exposition, and shall appoint all judges and examiners for the exposition, award all premiums, if any, and generally have charge of all intercourse with the exhibitors and the representatives of foreign nations.

SEC. 7. That after the plans for said exposition shall be prepared by said corporation and approved by said commission, the rules and regulations of said corporation governing rates for entrance and admission fees, or otherwise affecting the rights, privileges, or interests of the exhibitors or of the public, shall be fixed or established by said corporation, subject, however, to such modification, if any, as may be imposed by a majority of said commissioners.

SEC. 8. That the said commission shall provide for the dedication of the buildings of the World's Columbian Exposition in said city of Chicago on the 30th day of April, 1892, the one hundred and third anniversary of the inauguration of George Washington as first President of the United States, with appropriate ceremonies, and that the said exposition shall close on the 20th day of October, 1892.

SEC. 9. That whenever the President of the United States shall be notified by the commission that provision has been made for grounds and buildings for the uses herein provided for and there has also been filed with him by the said corporation known as "The World's Exposition of 1892" satisfactory proof that a sum not less than $10,000,000, to be used and expended for the purposes of the exposition herein authorized, has in fact been raised or provided for by subscription or other legally binding means, he shall be authorized, through the Department of State, to make proclamation of the same, setting forth the time at which the exposition will open and close, and the place at which it will be held; and he shall communicate to the diplomatic representatives of foreign nations copies of the same, together with such regulations as may be adopted by the commission, for publication in their respective countries, and he shall, in behalf of the Government and people, invite foreign nations to take part in the said exposition and appoint representatives thereto.

SEC. 10. That all articles which shall be imported from foreign countries for the sole purpose of exhibition at said exposition, upon which there shall be a tariff or customs duty, shall be admitted free of payment of duty, customs fees, or charges under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; but it shall be lawful at any time during the exhibition to sell for delivery at the close of the exposition any goods or property imported for and actually on exhibition in the exposition buildings or on its grounds, subject to such regulations for the security of the revenue and for the collection of the import duties as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe: Provided, That all such articles when sold or withdrawn for consumption in the United States shall be subject to the duty, if any, imposed upon such articles by the revenue laws in force at the date of importation, and all penalties prescribed by law shall be applied and enforced against such articles, and against the persons who may be guilty of any illegal sale or withdrawal.

SEC. 11. That the sum of $20,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the remainder of the present fiscal year and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury for purposes connected with the admission of foreign goods to said exhibition.

SEC. 12. That it shall be the duty of the commission to make report, from time to time, to the President of the United States of the progress of the work, and, in final report, present a full exhibit of the results of the exposition.

SEC. 13. That the commission hereby authorized shall exist no longer than until the 1st day of January, 1893.

SEC. 14. That the United States shall not in any manner, nor under any circumstances, be liable for any of the acts, doings, proceedings, or representations of the said corporation organized under the laws of the State of Illinois, its officers, agents, servants, or employees, or any of them, or for the service, salaries, labor, or wages of said officers, agents, servants, or employees, or any of them, or for any subscriptions to the capital stock, or for any certificates of stock, bonds, mortgages, or obligations of any kind issued by said corporation, or for any debts, liabilities, or expenses of any kind whatever attending such corporation or accruing by reason of the same.

SEC. 15. That there shall be exhibited at said exposition by the Government of the United States from its Executive Departments, the Smithsonian Institution, the United States Fish Commission, and the National Museum, such articles and materials as illustrate the function and administrative faculty of the Government in time of peace and its resources as a war power, tending to demonstrate the nature of our institutions and their adaptation to the wants of the people; and to secure a complete and harmonious arrangement of such a Government exhibit, a board shall be created to be charged with the selection, preparation, arrangement, safe-keeping, and exhibition of such articles and materials as the heads of the several Departments and the directors of the Smithsonian Institution and National Museum may respectively decide shall be embraced in said Government exhibit. The President may also designate additional articles for exhibition. Such board shall be composed of one person to be named by the head of each Executive Department and one by the directors of the Smithsonian Institution and National Museum, such selections to be approved by the President of the United States. The President shall name the chairman of said board, and the board itself shall select such other officers as it may deem necessary.

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to place on exhibition, upon such grounds as shall be allotted for the purpose, one of the life-saving stations authorized to be constructed on the coast of the United States by existing law, and to cause the same to be fully equipped with all apparatus, furniture, and appliances now in use in all life-saving stations in the United States, said building and apparatus to be removed at the close of the exhibition and re-erected at the place now authorized by law.

SEC. 16. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause a suitable building or buildings to be erected on the site selected for the World's Columbian Exposition for the Government exhibits, as provided in this act, and he is hereby authorized and directed to contract therefor, in the same manner and under the same regulations as for other public buildings of the United States; but the contracts for said building or buildings shall not exceed the sum of $400,000. And for the remainder of the fiscal year and for the fiscal year ending June 13, 1891, there is hereby appropriated for said building or buildings, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000.

SEC. 17. That for the purpose of paying the expenses of transportation, care, and custody of exhibits by the Government, and the maintenance of the building or buildings herebefore provided for, and the safe return of articles belonging to the said Government exhibit, and for the expenses of the commission created by this act, and other contingent expenses, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, upon itemized accounts and vouchers, there is hereby appropriated for the remainder of this fiscal year and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That the United States shall not be liable, on account of the erection of buildings, expenses of the commission or any of its officers or employees, or on account of any expenses incident to or growing out of said exposition, for a sum exceeding in the aggregate $1,500,000.

SEC. 18. That the commissioners and alternate commissioners appointed under this act shall not be entitled to any compensation for their services out of the Treasury of the United States, except their actual expenses for transportation and the sum of $5 per day for subsistence for each day they are necessarily absent from their homes on the business of said commission. The officers of said commission shall receive such compensation as may be fixed by said commission, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, which shall be paid out of the sums appropriated by Congress in aid of such exposition.

SEC. 19. That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to create any liability of the United States, direct or indirect, for any debt or obligation incurred, nor for any claim for aid or pecuniary assistance from Congress or the Treasury of the United States in support or liquidation of any debt or obligations created by said commission in excess of appropriations made by Congress therefor.

SEC. 20. That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to override or interfere with the laws of any State, and all contracts made in any State for the purposes of the exhibition shall be subject to the laws thereof.

SEC. 21. That no member of said commission, whether an officer or otherwise, shall be personally liable for any debt or obligation which may be created or incurred by the said commission.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have two amendments to submit, amendments which have been unanimously recommended by the committee, and to which I think there will be no objection in the House. The first amendment is to add to section 6 of the bill what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And said commission is authorized and required to appoint a board of lady managers of such number and to perform such duties as may be prescribed by said commission. Said board may appoint one or more members of all committees authorized to award prizes for exhibits which may be produced in whole or in part by female labor.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. I now move to amend section 15 by inserting, after the word "Museum," in line 20, the words "and one by the Fish Commission."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, when the Committee on the proposed World's Fair opened the debate upon this important subject, in the discussion of the original resolution that the House should select a site to hold the great exposition of 1892, I said substantially that it seemed to the committee that the rivalry between the three competing cities was an honor to the country.

I did not regard it as a rivalry between these cities for the privileges that might accrue to them in the local or material advancements of property or the increase of their material interests which would follow, although I believed that was a matter of great consequence to them. I believed that underlying their rivalry there was a spirit of patriotism, a public spirit, which implied a determination, not only to celebrate this commemoration of the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America, not only to celebrate that, but to win honor and distinction for their city and the country in giving to us and to the world at large a celebration that would be worthy of the great discovery and of that great discoverer and his name, Christopher Columbus, and also worthy of the continent which he gave to us and to all future time.

And, Mr. Speaker, I was not influenced in the judgment and statement, believing that I had the gift of prophecy. My opinion was founded upon their record in the past when I stated that I believed either one of the cities competing for this distinction that should be selected would prove equal to the great undertaking and would feel bound in honor to discharge every promise that had been made or implied in the debate on the general discussion of the question.

Now, as this committee comes before the House to-day to ask a final vote upon this important measure, it is a great satisfaction to open the debate by the statement that the city of Chicago, which was selected by the House as the place in which the fair should be held, has proved before the committee equal to all that was implied or expected of them or any other city that should be selected for this purpose. We have found in the hearing that we have had in the investigation before the committee that Chicago not only comprehended the importance and magnitude of the enterprise, but that she entered into it with a determined spirit, and impressed this committee that she would be successful in carrying out the undertaking.

Mr. Speaker, the bill which we submit to-day is the bill (H. R. 8393) presented as a substitute for House bill No. 6883. The bill is somewhat changed by consultations which we have had with the gentlemen from the city that was selected. The original bill was intended to cover the requirements of either one of the three cities; but it was stated at that time that we believed it would be necessary to insert some details after consultation with the representatives of the city that should be finally chosen. In this bill No. 8393 we do present some changes for your consideration. And, Mr. Speaker, we believe that the changes thus made are in the line of good legislation, and that we present a better bill for the consideration of the House, meeting some of the objections which have been presented before the House, and which objections have been covered by the provisions of the bill.

This bill which we now present increases the commissioners to be appointed from the different States from one to two from each State and Territory and eight at large. This is embodied in the second section of the bill.

In the third section we dispense with the proposed United States corporation, which it was suggested should be created and given power under the law; and it is stipulated also that the commissioners that are appointed shall be chosen equally from the two leading political parties of the country.

As we proceed, in the fourth section there is no essential change, except as to the question of a quorum after the first meeting, it being limited to the number present at that time. Provision is here made for the notification of the governors of the passage of the bill.

In the fifth section the commission, in place of acting as a corporation under the United States law, as in the previous bill, is authorized to accept for the World's Columbian Exposition the site, plans, and specifications of the buildings to be erected and tendered by the corporation created under the laws of the State of Illinois, known as the "World's Exposition of 1892."

The committee, in presenting this section, recognize the objections which have been made upon the floor of the House to a corporation under the United States laws. It is due to the city of Chicago to say at this time that the spirit of the Representatives from that city was to meet every objection from all sections of the country in the most liberal spirit that they could possibly meet by any action of theirs.

This suggestion to utilize a corporation of the State of Illinois, in place of calling upon this House to enact a law for a national corporation, came from the city of Chicago and was accepted by this committee as a wise suggestion. I will state to the House that this city has offered not only a generous contribution, but that it has desired to meet the views of the most conservative Representatives of the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that we have inaugurated possibly a plan of operation that in the future will be of advantage to this country, for I consider that great national and international exhibitions will be one of the eventful features of the development of the future of different nations. It is not a new thing; it is not an experiment with us, to give the indorsement of this House to national expositions. For a hundred years these expositions have been held in the old country and in this at different times. In 1798 France held her first exposition in Paris. And to show how the indorsement of it has been made year after year, or decade after decade, by different countries, to show how the spirit and the development of great expositions are exemplifying the fact that they must have been of public benefit, I will state there were 110 exhibitors in the first exposition in 1798 and there were 60,000 in the exposition in Philadelphia in 1876. From the earliest time in the different States and countries, they have called their people together to meet at their fairs and expositions, that they might show each their wares and become better acquainted with each other.

Mr. HERBERT. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CANDLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HERBERT. When did this Government first make an appropriation for a world's fair?

Mr. CANDLER. I think the first appropriation was made in 1876; but I will answer the gentleman's question, and I will call attention to the fact that it has been the policy of the Government in the North and the South to make appropriations for national and international expositions.

In 1876 they made a contribution to the city of Philadelphia to celebrate a great national event. Later they made a contribution for the city of New Orleans and the city of Atlanta; and, Mr. Speaker, I am glad the gentleman asks me the question. It has been suggested outside and on the floor of this House that we had the right to call upon our friends from the other side of the House and from the Southern section of the country to recognize the generosity of the other sections of the nation in contributing $1,650,000 to the fair held in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not make any appeal to the gentlemen who represent the Southern States of this country to support this bill because this House and this nation has at a preceding time generously contributed to them.

I shall advocate the passage of this bill on its merits, because it is a wise and patriotic thing to do. I will say further that had I been in this House then I should have voted to give to the State of Louisiana and the city of New Orleans for the fair the contribution which was made. I believed then, and I believe now, that it was constitutional, and in the bill which we originally presented we believed we presented a constitutional bill. I shall not make an argument on that. I will say I believe for one that was a wise and patriotic contribution. Though I differ with the gentlemen from the South on questions of public policy and politics, I admire the spirit that prompted them to endeavor to have a great national fair to attract attention in this country and the world to their struggles for prosperity and for the development of the resources of their section.

I go further than that, Mr. Speaker. I am not one of those who believe that the brightest pages in the history of the past thirty years will be found recorded in their battle-roll or in their records of the war, with all its strife and cruelty. However brave, however glorious, however much to be admired may have been their bravery on the battlefield, there will be brighter pages in the history of this past thirty years than those that tell of victories in the war of the rebellion. It will be illustrated by the struggles you have made and the indomitable spirit which the Southern people have shown when they in their sorrow and desolation turned their faces to the coming day from the darkness of the night and entered in the struggle for the prosperity which was due to them. I believe that will be the brightest period in that history, and will show the fortitude and courage that they developed. It is a credit to them and it is an honor to us as a part of the common history of the country. I shall not, I say, appeal to the gentlemen from that section of this country in the House to vote for this bill because they have had a generous contribution. I shall ask them to vote for it upon its merits.

Mr. KILGORE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question. He talks about a contribution having been made to Philadelphia for the celebration in 1876. Now, is not the fact that that was a loan to Philadelphia and that it has been paid back?

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. Part of it.

Mr. KILGORE. Was it not all paid back?

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir.

Mr. KILGORE. Did they not have the use of it and were they not then required to return it?

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. A loan of $2,250,000 was made to Philadelphia, and $1,600,000 was paid back.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, now, is it not the fact that it was not intended to be a contribution to New Orleans? Was it not intended to be nothing but a loan, but by reason of the loose manner in which the loan was contracted New Orleans beat the Government of the United States out of the money?

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to enter into a discussion as to whether New Orleans beat the United States out of money or not. I am calling attention to the fact that a contribution was made. I admire the enterprise of the South for asking for it and trying, when her people had been so heavily burdened, to have an exposition made before the country of what her resources were.

Mr. KILGORE. It was a loan. That is what I am getting at.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. I do not care whether it was a loan or not. I believe that if it was a loan and if they had come successfully out of the struggles which they have had to undergo and were as rich as Chicago is, they would have paid the loan. At all events, it was money well invested for the benefit of the whole country. Not only is this bill conservatively drawn; not only are the committee satisfied that there is a bona fide subscription, a subscription of $5,000,000 that will be paid, but they are satisfied that the city of Chicago has done more than we expected, when we brought in our original bill, from either of the cities, in agreeing that her contribution shall be $10,000,000. And, Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Texas I wish to accent that statement. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that no fair has ever been proposed in this country or any other for which was provided so large a sum to insure success and to insure the meeting of every obligation as this fair which we now propose.

We have learned something from the experience of the past. I honor the city of Philadelphia for the effort which she made to have the great fair of 1876, but there was not enough money provided for that great undertaking. Only $3,000,000 was originally in sight as a fund with which to pay the expenses of that great fair. In New Orleans they subscribed less than $1,000,000, and we have learned the lesson, and the city of Chicago, comprehending the magnitude of this great undertaking, has realized that to make it a success, not only before the people of the United States, but before the people of the world, she should have $10,000,000, a sum more than a million and a half larger than the fund for the French fair. And once more I repeat, the difficulty with the fairs that have preceded this has been that their promoters did not originally supply a sufficient amount of money to place the enterprise beyond question as to financial results.

In regard to the fifth section, I will call attention to another conservative element in this bill. We have examined on the part of the committee everything bearing upon the subscription of $5,000,000 and the guaranty of $5,000,000 more, and we feel that every reasonable assurance has been given that the money will be raised. We would call attention also to the fact that, as a business proposition, $5,000,000 is sufficient to guaranty the success of the fair, and that the receipts will almost certainly be sufficient to discharge every obligation without calling upon the Government or any one else. The assurance has been given to us by citizens of Chicago who are entitled to the confidence of this House and of the country that they will raise $10,000,000. The case can be clearly comprehended from the report which we have submitted, and it does not seem to me to be my duty at this time to anticipate the discussion of that report which will be made in this debate.

In this bill we have not only endeavored to meet the objection of gentlemen who are opposed to a national corporation, we have not only examined and assured ourselves that this contribution is a bona fide one, but we have provided that this commission shall review the action of the committee, and shall go to Chicago to satisfy themselves that the contribution is bona fide and will be paid. And, Mr. Speaker, we go further than that, so as to meet the most conservative element in this House, and we provide that the President of the United States shall not issue his proclamation to invite other nations to take part in the fair, thus involving our national dignity and self-respect in this great undertaking, until he is satisfied that this contribution is a bona fide one and will be paid.

Under these circumstances it seems to me that it is due to the people of the great city which has been chosen that we should not delay the indorsement which the Government of the United States is bound to give them, and that we should give them that assurance without delay, so that they may know on what basis to lay their plans for the future. I do not feel that it is my duty to enter into longer or wider discussion of the sentiment which underlies the question of holding the fair at all. I think this House can not forget the debate which we listened to here when the first report of the committee was made, because it was so national and patriotic and the question was so ably discussed that it must have left a marked impression upon this House and upon the country.

I believe that the gentlemen who made speeches here in favor of holding the fair, when we were selecting a site, were sincere and honest in what they said, and if that is the fact this bill must be passed not only by the votes of those who favored the selection of the city of Chicago, but by the votes of Representatives from every section of the country, including those from the different States which sought to have the fair located within their own borders. The committee feel that there is no longer any question about holding the fair, and that the only subject which we are bound to devote much time to in the discussion of this bill is the question of the proper conservative enactments and safeguards to be embodied in it.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer another amendment, to be acted upon when the vote on the main question is taken. I will read the amendment now, because later I may not have an opportunity to explain it as I should like to do. The amendment is to strike out section 8 of the bill and to substitute therefor the following:

That said commission shall provide for the dedication of the buildings of the World's Columbian Exposition in said city of Chicago on the 12th day of April, 1892, with proper ceremonies, and that said exposition shall be opened to visitors not later than the 1st day of May, 1893, and shall be closed at such time as the commission may determine, but not later than the 30th day of October thereafter.

I do not offer this amendment from the committee; I offer it as a member of the committee. But, Mr. Speaker, I may say that it was discussed before we presented our original resolution. I believe that the duty of the committee is not only to present to the House a conservative bill which will command the confidence of the House, is not only to meet the wishes of the city of Chicago, but also to incorporate into this bill everything that it is believed will prove to the advantage of this great enterprise.

I believe that this amendment is an important one, not for the city of Chicago—she does not ask it—but for the exhibitors who may wish to take part in the exposition. I believed originally that it would be wiser to hold the opening ceremonies on the 12th day of October, 1892, so that we might fitly recognize the great commemorative event, but not to open the exhibition until the spring of 1893, and I believe that when gentlemen consider this amendment they will see the wisdom of it and will adopt it in the bill. I will send the amendment to the desk, to be acted upon at the proper time.

We have made, Mr. Speaker, some other changes in this bill—

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. In connection with the remark of the gentleman in regard to amendments, I wish to say that I have an amendment to section 7; and I wish to inquire whether we are to be allowed to offer amendments.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir; but I prefer the gentleman should offer the amendment in the time allotted for that purpose.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Certainly. I simply wished to inquire whether opportunity will be afforded to offer amendments before the previous question operates.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir; that is the intention of the committee.

Mr. Speaker, I will call attention again to the desire of this committee not only to present a bill that shall satisfy the most conservative judgment of the House in regard to a national corporation, the desire of the committee not only to feel an assurance on their own part of the genuineness of the contributions which are offered, but that there shall be checks upon their opinion by the action of the commissioners. I would like also to call attention to the fact that we limit the entire appropriation of the Government to the original sum of $1,500,000, which is to pay the expenses of the Government exhibit, of the commission, of the part the Government takes in this great celebration in giving it recognition. As we studied the bill to put it in practical operation, we found it was not necessary that the whole amount of $1,500,000 should be appropriated at this time.

After careful calculation we found that $320,000 was, in our judgment, all that would be required until the close of the fiscal year of 1891. The appropriation that will be called for from this House will only amount until July, 1891, to $320,000; and we continue to advocate as the limit of our appropriation the original sum, $1,500,000.

Referring again, Mr. Speaker, to the contributions which have been made, referring again to the generosity and the magnitude of what Chicago has undertaken to present, it seems to me that $1,500,000 on the part of the Government is not an extravagant appropriation. I believe the return of this expenditure will be in greater fold than that estimated by President Walker as the return from the exposition of 1876. He claimed that in thirteen years the Philadelphia exposition had returned a hundred-fold to the people of this country.

And, Mr. Speaker, I believe to-day, with the great advance in population, with the wonderful growth of the inventive genius of the country, with the enormous development of the resources of the United States, with your Birminghams and your Chattanoogaes to send up their contribution as an indication of what there is hidden beneath the rich soil of that as yet undeveloped section of our country—I believe that the return, as compared with the return from the Exposition of 1876, will be more than a hundred-fold.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I would like to interrupt the gentleman just one moment to ask a question.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. Very well.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, the chairman of this committee, to inform the House how much the Government appropriated for its own purposes to the Centennial of 1876. It seems to me that a million and a half of dollars is a very large sum; but perhaps after the lapse of sixteen years it is not too large a sum to make this exposition at Chicago a great success, a result which I want to see accomplished. But I would like the gentleman to state to the House how meager the appropriation of the Government was to the Centennial at Philadelphia.

I think a million and a half of dollars is not a very lucky amount, because some gentlemen from Illinois—Mr. SPRINGER, for instance—may perhaps after awhile endeavor to get this gift to the Chicago exposition paid back to the Government, just as Philadelphia was required to pay back the million and a half of dollars contributed at that time by the Government. The amount proposed for this appropriation, I repeat, is not a very lucky sum [laughter]; but I would like the gentleman to give to the House the information I have indicated.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have already referred to Philadelphia, giving her, I think, sufficient credit for her patriotism. I do believe that the contribution to Philadelphia was less than it should have been. At the same time, desiring to meet the conservative element in this House, we took the basis of population, not the increase of wealth, and doubled it in arriving at the sum to be contributed toward this great fair, which in my judgment will exceed any fair that has ever been held in the world. A contribution of a million and a half of dollars from the Government of the United States to-day is not in proportion to the development which the United States Government has to show in her National Museum, in her Fish Commission, and in the display of the mineral wealth of the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker—and I thank the gentleman from Philadelphia for his suggestion—I wish to call attention to the Government's treasures in Washington. I know of no way to educate the people of these United States to a higher standard of enlightenment than by giving the millions of our population an opportunity to see the treasures of the Government. I do not believe in hiding those treasures even in the museum here, when this vast country has so many millions of people who can not come to the city of Washington. I believe in sending these treasures to the different sections of the country, and not only giving the people an opportunity to see them, but giving the intelligent press of the United States an opportunity to record a description of them; for even when the people do not see these treasures the impetus which this fair will give to the literature and the newspapers of the country will be a means of education to the people which can scarcely be estimated.

I will not enter into any further comparison between this fair and those that have been held in other countries. It is enough to repeat that the city of Chicago and the United States propose to devote more money to this fair than any country has heretofore devoted to such an enterprise. It is enough to say that no city has ever professed honestly, or in any way, the amount which the city of Chicago offers to-day as its contribution to the fair. And, Mr. Speaker, I can not but believe that the American people will sustain the action of this House. We all believe in fair play; and when we see a city that commences as wisely and with as much enterprise as did the city of Chicago—beginning in September, 1889, the study of what was required and following it up by an intelligent commission, so that to-day she knows well what are the requirements of this great exposition—when we see a city beginning early and investigating the matter patiently and intelligently, and when she comes forward with this generosity to meet all the requirements of the fair, I can not but believe that this patriotic and intelligent House, the Representative of the people, will indorse those efforts, and will, without delay, give the people of Chicago an opportunity to go on with this great work.

Mr. Speaker, one thing more. I do believe in this fair as a great advantage to every section of the country. I do not think that one section will be more benefited than another. I believe that it will be a means of education to the people. I believe it will be the means of developing and encouraging the inventive and industrial interests of the country. I believe it is in the right direction. I believe, as some one has well said, that in this country the "price of liberty" is not only "eternal vigilance," but constant progress; and this enterprise is in the line of progress.

I believe while we encourage the prosperity and elevate and instruct and educate the people, every decade brings us nearer to a wise settlement of problems which are before us and which we have to meet. I believe this will give an impetus to the business prosperity of the country.

I believe that the millions that will be brought in here to be expended in this country will be of advantage to the people. I believe these contributions of the rich to pay the expenses of this great national exposition in the city of Chicago will not only prove of advantage to all the business and industrial interests of the country, but it will give employment to the toiling masses, and it will prove a blessing to the men who give from their abundant means for the purpose.

Mr. Speaker, I do believe each decade we can legislate for the prosperity of the country, every wise measure that passes this House that improves the condition of commerce and trade, that promotes prosperity, that fosters the varied interests of the country, is leading to higher and more enlightened position, is instructing us and improving the minds of the people to be qualified better to legislate on the great problems that confront us, of race and the struggle between capital and labor. And if we can succeed in keeping our country always marching onward to higher and better things we shall find the problems that look so difficult to-day will be settled for the country wisely and peacefully. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. I yield to my colleague [Mr. BELDEN] whatever time he desires.

Mr. BELDEN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say New York accepted the decision of this House in regard to the location of the world's fair in good faith. She has since said not a word or performed an act to reverse that decision. But that does not prevent her Representatives upon this floor from insisting that there shall be incorporated in this bill such safeguards as will secure the success they expected to secure had the fair been located at New York instead of Chicago.

The vote of February 24 located the fair in Chicago; the next day the committee met and assigned the bill referred to them that day to a subcommittee consisting of the chairman, who has just spoken, and two members of the committee representing the city of Chicago, with instructions to make such amendments to the bill as the Chicago people desired and report it back to the full committee, with the proviso that they should offer such guaranties before reporting the bill as New York had offered when a candidate for the fair.

After nearly three weeks of herculean efforts on the part of Chicago, after telegraphing backwards and forwards, they called us together to read the bill to us. When it was presented we said, "We care not for particulars if they satisfy Chicago. What we want is the guaranty they promised us." Then we called upon them to show what they were to do; how they were to guaranty there should be no default of subscription; to produce the guaranty.

Lo and behold! they produce a paper marked Exhibit A, with some names on it, with no heading, with no subscription, with no statement in regard to it, but they said that represented the money that had been subscribed.

That purported subscription paper was in the hands of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER]. We could have the privilege of seeing it. The committee was called together to look at it, but it was not for the public. There was no subscription for the public. There was a copy there. There was some one who brought it. I looked at that subscription, and the first name was E. St. John, $395,000. I called upon the chairman to know what that meant, as I had heard only $100,000 had been given in one subscription. He did not know, although he had prepared this wonderful report. He said that Chicago had done everything, but he did not know how the first subscription was there.

When I called upon Mr. SPRINGER for information in respect to the matter, he tells me that some railroad men had a meeting, at which meeting they resolved or said that they would raise $395,000. They had not subscribed it and have not yet as far as I know; that is, there is no evidence of it, and I take it that it has not been done, because as a matter of fact I believe there was a dispute about it when they broke up. That is the way the subscription starts out.

But the next paper is Exhibit B, with another subscription, in which the number of subscribers is put at 1,778 and the amount subscribed $614,770, in sums ranging from $200 to $1,000. On the back of this subscription is a memorandum that some one else has subscribed $864,000, but who is not stated. We inquired who it was or what it was or how it was subscribed, and were informed that it was a subscription containing some 27,000 names, and it was too large and bulky to bring here to Washington. Not a name given, not a place of business mentioned, not a place where the subscriber lives, what he is worth, or anything whatever about it.

Now, that is a wonderful subscription and a remarkable evidence of the liberality on the part of Chicago, of which the chairman of the committee tells us so much—not a dollar of money subscribed or shown to the committee in any manner or shape. We have asked them to show it, and now I challenge them to show it.

It is easy enough, Mr. Speaker, to talk and say "We expect to be able to raise that sum," and telegrams are shown as to what they are doing out there, that "Chicago never fails," that she will be always found up "square to the mark," that "we are with you," and so on. But is that what the House wants to frame a bill upon or make an appropriation upon? That is all you are presented with, however, nothing more nor less, and upon that you are asked to take action. To-day the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has in his possession that list of names, which, he says, is not for the public. Now, how are we to frame our bill or base our action unless we know the facts? How are we to know that they have made a subscription at all? Upon what basis are we to act?

But when New York was a candidate for this business she selected from her midst one hundred and three of the best names to be found in that State, men of wealth, men of distinction, men that all of you know. They subscribed over $5,000,000 and gave their places of business, their residences, and brought their subscriptions before the Senate, and at that time the chairman asked Mr. Jefferys, who appeared for Chicago, if he would file their subscription? He says, "Oh, yes; if required." But he forgot, and three, no, four weeks ago yesterday the vote was taken on the bill, and yet not a dollar has been subscribed or a single dollar presented before the committee. Mr. HATCH and myself, as members of the committee, urged them to produce their subscription. We did not want to stand in the way of the fair, but to do all that Chicago wanted. But we must have something to go on. We wanted something to go back to the House with and show that we had protected the interests of the Government.

We asked them to have some proof exhibited of what they were doing, to give us the names of some of their prominent men; and we named some of their prominent men ourselves, men that we knew, being satisfied that if they would pledge their indorsements they could succeed in doing what we required and expected, and asked them to get these parties to telegraph to us if it was all right. But no, the chairman says, "We have got everything we want;" and they have nothing.

When New York came and asked the establishment of this fair in that city she brought a list of names; she came with the site selected; with the plans prepared. She came with fifty or sixty of the most respectable and reputable men, men of means, who pledged themselves before you to make this a success; told what their plans were; showed you their list of subscriptions; showed you their means; showed you their maps of the buildings and their subscription lists, and you considered it in the committee.

New York said that she did not want the fair unless it was to be the best and most complete that was ever held. She was determined that it should be so; and when she had over $5,000,000 subscription guaranteed and brought here, we gave notice to the committee and to the House and to the world that unless we could have $10,000,000 more we would not want the fair or ask it. And yet Chicago only brings this paper and nothing more. They telegraph you—

Mr. LAWLER. Would the gentleman allow an interruption at this point?

Mr. BELDEN. I will.

Mr. LAWLER. There are several gentlemen here now listening in compliment to Mr. BELDEN, and it is perfectly right and proper that they should, who will not be present perhaps when the various assertions he makes might be corrected. I wish to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that some gentlemen of standing, financially and otherwise, came before that committee and satisfied a majority of the committee, at least, of the financial standing of the proposition to take and do what was right by the fair in Chicago? Secondly, I would like to ask—

Mr. BELDEN. Let me answer one question at a time. I say in answer to the gentleman that but three members of the committee, the chairman and the two Illinois members, had these people before them, and the other gentleman on the committee knew nothing about what they said. I am telling what was produced to the committee and nothing more.

Mr. LAWLER. Did you happen to be present and meet a gentleman named Lyman J. Gage and others from Chicago?

Mr. BELDEN. No, sir; I did not have that pleasure nor did the committee. It was only the members of the subcommittee.

Mr. ADAMS. But you might have had the opportunity if you had been here. Were you in the city at the time that these gentlemen were here?

Mr. BELDEN. They did not call the committee together at all.

Mr. ADAMS. But the gentleman from New York was in fact absent for ten days in New York when these gentlemen were here.

Mr. BELDEN. Was the committee called together at all, I ask the gentleman?

Mr. ADAMS. I am not finding fault with the gentleman, of course; but what I do say is that the gentleman was in fact absent from the city for ten days while Mr. Gage was here, and was ready to answer any questions that might have been propounded to him.

Mr. BELDEN. Was it my business as a committeeman to go to Mr. Gage to find out what he had to say? I say that he did not go to any member of this committee except these three, and that the committee was not called together.

Mr. ADAMS. But still the gentleman being absent could not have had an opportunity of meeting Mr. Gage.

Mr. BELDEN. It was not my place to hunt him up.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Who were the three members of the committee the gentleman refers to?

Mr. BELDEN. Mr. HITT, Mr. SPRINGER, and the chairman.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Were they the subcommittee?

Mr. BELDEN. They were the subcommittee.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. This is an important subject, and members would like very well to know what is going on. The House is not able to hear whether this a baseball club arguing with the umpire or what is going on, as nobody can hear anything. Being able to see is one thing and able to hear is another. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it understands the point of order.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. This looks more like a club than a base-ball club.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will please take their seats.

Mr. BELDEN. I think there would be no trouble about the gentleman from Illinois asking a question.

Mr. LAWLER. I think it is right that a mark of courtesy might be shown Mr. BELDEN.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Illinois will speak from his seat it would be better.

Mr. LAWLER. Mr. Speaker, I am not a very loud orator myself, like Mr. BELDEN. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LAWLER] be allowed to proceed.

Mr. LAWLER. I merely wanted to ask Mr. BELDEN—

Mr. MASON. I can not hear either gentleman.

Mr. BELDEN. You will hear me.

Mr. LAWLER. I wanted to ask Mr. BELDEN this question—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois must not call members by name.

Mr. LAWLER. There are so many from New York. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELDEN. The gentleman has his eye on me. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAWLER. I will now ask the gentleman from New York this question, if he has any doubt in his mind—

Mr. MCCREARY. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MCCREARY. It is impossible to hear on this side of the Chamber what gentlemen are saying. I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois and my friend from New York that they go to the center aisle. This is a very interesting subject.

Mr. LAWLER. There is a very evident intention not to allow me to ask the gentleman from New York a question. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. FLOWER. I want to know whether this is to be taken out of the time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELDEN].

Mr. BELDEN. I yield to Mr. LAWLER, of Illinois, for a question.

Mr. LAWLER. I simply want to ask Mr. BELDEN this question, and I will not trouble him with any further interruptions: in his knowledge of the business men of Chicago has he any question or doubt in his mind that they will carry out what they say in regard to making this world's fair a grand success, financially and otherwise?

Mr. BELDEN. I will answer that by saying that if talk will do it they will. [Laughter and applause.] But if it requires money they do not put it up, or at least they have not. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. LAWLER. Mr. BELDEN—I mean the gentleman from New York—I would like to ask you this question: If you want to announce to this House that New York was able to take hold of so large a fair as this world's fair is intended to be and make it a success in the face of the fact that the Grant monument to-day has not been completed? [Renewed laughter and applause.] Chicago has carried out everything to the present time contemplated by it.

Mr. BELDEN. In talk. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAWLER. I make this statement, and I will verify it again, that if $5,000,000 or $10,000,000 or $25,000,000 are necessary to make the world's fair a success in Chicago, it will be raised within the next six months. [Applause.]

Mr. BELDEN. I did not yield to the gentleman to make a speech.

Mr. LAWLER. One word more and I am done.

Mr. BELDEN. I did not yield to the gentleman for a speech.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York declines to yield.

Mr. LAWLER. Just this, and I am done.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. BELDEN. I yield for a question.

Mr. LAWLER. As to the railroad men. Mr. St. John is the general agent of the Chicago, Rock Island and—

Mr. BELDEN. I decline to yield further.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York declines to yield, and he is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LAWLER. I understood that he would allow that question to be made as a correction. Well, I will get at it later.

Mr. BELDEN. Now, Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, when New York came to this House she came with a subscription of over $5,000,000, with the names of the different gentlemen, with their places of business and residence and the amount subscribed opposite to each. We brought to the city of Washington fifty-eight of our most distinguished and wealthy men to see you in person and assure you that every dollar of it should be paid. We brought to you plans of a building. We brought to you a site selected. We brought to you authority for a promise of $10,000,000 more. We had secured a site and we had secured what was asked for the fair. I say that we showed her position and her interest in this matter; that we should secure a fair, and such a fair as we intended to give you had the fair been held in New York. I say that our Representatives here will join with Chicago, and use as much zeal and work as hard, and even talk as much as the chairman about Chicago's having done well as any other person. But they want, before making this appropriation, before passing this bill and authorizing the appointment of two commissioners from each State and Territory and eight alternate commissioners at large, that Chicago, before that, shall give us some assurance of $10,000,000 or show her ability to do it. I desire to quote from the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LAWLER]. On page 1561 of the RECORD I find he said:

I want the New York people to come beyond the Alleghany Mountains once and see what we have got in the great West. I say that Chicago stands ready to make this a successful enterprise. Chicago does not ask a dollar to bear the expenses; but our business men will subscribe, if necessary, $25,000,000 to make this exhibition what it ought to be in this country.

Mr. LAWLER. I know they will do it; I know them so well. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELDEN. Mr. SPRINGER said in the same day:

But Chicago's proposition is ample to secure success. It is this: $10,000,000 in money and a site; while New York's proposition, when reduced to the real purposes of the fair, means only $5,000,000 and the site.

Mr. LAWLER. Now you want us to put up ten millions.

Mr. BELDEN. No, sir; but you should put up something that is satisfactory.

Now, I would like the House to look at that paper. I looked for it. I understand it is in Mr. SPRINGER's desk. I would like you to see what the chairman of the committee calls now the nobility of this enterprise.

Look at it for yourselves. After the general committee got together, and when pressed to state what evidence there was that this subscription would be paid, or that Chicago proposed to furnish anything, the Chicago men said: "We will telegraph to Chicago and find out." They then produced this answer, which they received at that time, or which perhaps they had before:

We wish you continued success in Washington. We will stand by you and the committee in every way. Chicago will now, as in the past, prove equal to every emergency. You can count on our support.

There it is—words again.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BELDEN. I will.

Mr. CANNON. Section 9 of this bill provides that the fair shall not be recognized by the President nor placed on its feet until the President is satisfied that $10,000,000 is secured.

Mr. BELDEN. I am coming to that very soon.

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me that provision is an answer to the gentleman's argument.

Mr. BELDEN. In reply to what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has suggested, I have this to say: If this House is ready to pass this bill, to provide for a commission consisting of two members from each State and Territory and eight members at large, if they are prepared to pass the bill providing for this commission and to appropriate money, and to do all the other things that are to be done by way of preparation, and to have this commission assemble at Chicago and come to a decision, and then to have the President decide whether Chicago has furnished or will furnish the $10,000,000 or not, that is all well.

If that is satisfactory to the House, the bill is all right. Of course you have got the promise of the representatives of Chicago that they will furnish the $10,000,000, and, after you have gone through all these proceedings, passed this bill and appointed your commission, and they have met in Chicago, and the President has decided, if, after all that is done, the $10,000,000 is not furnished, you will have the blessed privilege of declaring the project a failure and throwing it up. But is that the way to do? Why didn't they raise this money in the thirty days they have had since the House located the fair? Why didn't they do it before? Why don't they do it now? Why don't they get some new subscriptions? Why don't they show us something that is satisfactory? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] in his speech when the bill was under consideration said this:

We have thus an available fund of $10,000,000. Not a dollar of this will have to be paid to buy or to condemn lands; not a dollar will be used for the permanent improvement of Chicago or the park system of Chicago.

Now, where is the money? That is what I am inquiring about. That is what I am looking for. I repeat, the whole question may be summed up in the question whether this House, after it has selected the site and has given Chicago nearly a month and during which she has not raised a dollar or presented a dollar of guaranty fund of any kind, is willing to go on and pass this bill, appoint this commission, prepare for the fair, and take as collateral the privilege of declaring the fair a failure if Chicago does not keep her promises. Why appropriate the money until you know whether you are going to have the fair? Why make all these preparations in advance? Why does not Chicago do as New York has done?

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BELDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ADAMS. Is it the understanding of the gentleman that no subscriptions have been made in Chicago?

Mr. BELDEN. I do not know whether any have been made or not. There have been none produced. I make that statement. We have been told that subscriptions have been made, but none have been produced.

Mr. ADAMS. Has the gentleman any belief or any suspicion that no subscriptions have been made in Chicago?

Mr. BELDEN. I have seen a paper which I have been told is a copy of the subscription paper, but I have found errors in it to the amount of $395,000 which they admit never was subscribed. There is another error of $884,000, and the subscription paper is not to be made public, and I have a right to assume that there is something wrong about it.

Mr. ADAMS. Does the gentleman in fact assume that no subscriptions have been made?

Mr. BELDEN. I do not. But I assume the right of this House to know whether subscriptions have been made and what subscriptions have been made, and to know in such a manner that there can be no mistake about it, so that the House may be secure and may know what they are doing when they pass this bill.

Mr. ADAMS. If the gentleman will allow me I will state that I, of course, know personally nothing about these subscriptions except my own, but I will say that the original subscriptions are in Chicago, where they have to be in order to the organization of the corporation under the laws of the State of Illinois. I received notice the day before yesterday to send forward a proxy in order that my share might be voted upon, and I forwarded the proxy and I have no doubt whatever that the corporation will be organized under the laws of Illinois.

Mr. BELDEN. Well, I do not think that is essential one way or the other.

Mr. ADAMS. If the gentleman will pardon me, I have made this statement only because the gentleman intimated that he had seen no evidence and that there was no reason to believe that one dollar had been subscribed.

Mr. BELDEN. I did not mean to say that I did not believe that one dollar had been subscribed. What I say is that I know nothing about it, nor does any one else here. I venture to say that there is no man in this House or in the city of Washington who has ever seen subscriptions amounting to the sum they claim.

Mr. ADAMS. I have seen mine.

Mr. BELDEN. Oh yes, you have seen yours, but that does not go far towards carrying out this enterprise. I have no doubt you will see it again. Somebody had to pay the 2 per cent., and you were probably called upon to pay that amount of yours.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BELDEN. I will.

Mr. CANNON. As this fair has been located by a formal vote at Chicago and as the present bill is well drawn, I suggest that we now compromise by conceding that New York shall have the fair one hundred years from now. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELDEN. I will answer that by saying that New York has all she wants. Had she secured the fair it would not be a "white elephant;" she would not back and fill, cut and shuffle the cards as Chicago is doing in regard to this fair.

Mr. MASON. Did you say you want Chicago to have the fair?

Mr. BELDEN. I did, sir.

Mr. MASON. Is this the way to help us?

Mr. BELDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MASON. Thank you. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELDEN. I am a better friend of a successful fair by standing here and insisting that provision shall be made to make it successful than a man who stands here and says, "Oh, never mind; we will fix that by and by; after you have appropriated the money, after you have appointed the commissioners from every State and Territory and asked them to meet at Chicago, then we will fix the matter up, or if we do not you may declare the thing to be a failure." I am a better friend to the fair than to take any such position. I am speaking now because I want this fair to be a success, and I want it to be at Chicago. I do not want it in New York; New York does not ask for it; but she will not submit to be misrepresented and humiliated in regard to this matter. She came here manfully, boldly, and squarely presenting her subscription, her plan, her site, her $15,000,000. She brought the evidence here to show that the money was secured. Chicago claims to have raised $5,000,000, but she does not present evidence that this amount has been raised. She asks us to agree to accept $5,000,000 and get along with that, and if she does not produce the other $5,000,000 she agrees that we may declare the matter a failure. I am sorry for the position that Chicago has taken in this matter. It is a pity that there can not be some money assured.

Mr. MASON. Do not waste your pity on us.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Illinois (to Mr. BELDEN). Were you not invited to go to Chicago, where you would have had opportunity to inform yourself on all these questions?

Mr. BELDEN. I was. Now let me answer that question a little more fully. I was invited to go with a party on a special train, to be dined and wined, and to be shown what the people would do. It was the same old story. But when I touched on the subject of the subscription, when I asked, "Will they show us one if we go there?" the answer was silence.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Illinois. Why did you not go and give yourself the opportunity to get information?

Mr. BELDEN. I have no doubt that if I had gone to Chicago I would have been treated handsomely. But I did not want to go there simply to hear this matter talked about. I did not want to hear any more talk. The fair has been located at Chicago, and I wanted to hear about her contribution in money. That is what I want now.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Illinois. If the $10,000,000 were brought here now, would you not want to take it to the Treasury to see whether it was counterfeit?

Mr. BELDEN. Let the gentleman go over and get that subscription and show it to the House.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Illinois. Mr. Gage's name is signed to that subscription—

Mr. BELDEN. I desire to offer the motion which I send to the desk. The Clerk read as follows:

That the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the World's Fair, with instructions to report the same back with a favorable recommendation when a guaranty fund of $10,000,000 shall be secured by citizens of Chicago, the sufficiency and legality of which shall be satisfactory to said committee.

Mr. FLOWER. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN].

Mr. McMILLIN. I desire to offer an amendment and have it pending for action at the proper time, or it may be acted on now, if that be preferred. I ask the Clerk to read my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 16.

Mr. McMILLIN. Section 16 is in this language:

SEC. 16. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause a suitable building or buildings to be erected on the site selected for the World's Columbian Exposition for the Government exhibits, as provided in this act, and he is hereby authorized and directed to contract therefor, in the same manner and under the same regulations as for other public buildings of the United States; but the contracts for said building or buildings shall not exceed the sum of $400,000, and for the remainder of the fiscal year, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, there is hereby appropriated for said building or buildings, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000.

Mr. Speaker, in the bill providing for the Centennial Exhibition of 1876 there was no provision for the erection of a building by the Government of the United States; in the bill providing for the exposition at New Orleans there was no such provision. After this fair at Chicago is ended the Government will have no use whatever for the building which this bill proposes to erect at a cost of $400,000. In the interest, therefore, of good government and looking to that which I deem to be correct legislation, I have offered this amendment to strike out the section I have read, which provides for the construction of a building by the Government of the United States for its exhibits. The world's fair commission will be called upon to provide space, free, for the other nations of the world; at least I suppose that will be the case with many of the nations; and I see no reason why the Government of the United States should, at an expense of nearly half a million dollars, erect a building which it does not need.

If I have any further time I yield it to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], who desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to offer the following amendment, to be pending—

The SPEAKER. Is the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN]?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; it is an amendment to the next section.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it can not be pending now.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then I reserve the residue of my five minutes—

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see how two amendments can be pending at the same time, unless one is an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to the reading; they should be taken up in their regular order.

The SPEAKER. The first is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN].

Mr. FLOWER. I do not hear what is going on.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] can now be voted on.

Mr. MILLS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Will there be any opportunity given to members to offer amendments and vote on their adoption?

The SPEAKER. There is one amendment now pending, offered by the gentleman from Tennessee; and when that is voted on another amendment will be in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. One amendment was offered by the chairman before that.

The SPEAKER. If there is an amendment offered by the chairman, then that is the pending amendment, and the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee is not.

Mr. MILLS. After the debate has closed will there be opportunity to offer amendments?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see how there can be.

Mr. FLOWER. That is the reason I yielded to gentlemen in order to get their amendments in.

The SPEAKER. The first amendment is that offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CANDLER], chairman of the committee. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] The Clerk will read that amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 8 and insert the following:

"SEC. 8. That said commission shall provide for the dedication of the buildings in the World's Columbian Exposition in said city of Chicago on the 12th day of October, 1892, with appropriate ceremonies, and said exposition shall be open to visitors not later than the 1st day of May, 1893, and shall be closed at such time as the commission may determine, but not later than the 30th day of October thereafter."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the section to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the said commission shall provide for the dedication of the buildings of the World's Columbian Exposition in said city of Chicago on the 30th day of April, 1892, the one hundred and third anniversary of the inauguration of George Washington as first President of the United States, with appropriate ceremonies, and that the said exposition shall close on the 20th day of October, 1892.

The SPEAKER. The question is on striking out and inserting.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is it the desire to take the vote on this immediately?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes; let us have a vote.

The amendment of Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts, was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLIN. Now my amendment comes in.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] is now pending, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 16.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the section to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause a suitable building or buildings to be erected on the site selected for the World's Columbian Exposition for the Government exhibits, as provided in this act, and he is hereby authorized and directed to contract therefor, in the same manner and under the same regulations as for other public buildings of the United States; but the contracts for said building or buildings shall not exceed the sum of $400,000, and for the remainder of the fiscal year and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, there is hereby appropriated for said building or buildings, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000.

The SPEAKER. The question is on striking out the section just read. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. One reason I have is that the Government appropriates only one million and a half of dollars for this purpose. The gentleman stated the Government did not erect buildings at Philadelphia for their own exhibits. I think he is mistaken in that statement. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to have a few minutes to explain.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. I will yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make his explanation.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. The Government of the United States expended, all told, on the exposition of 1876, $535,000, and in my opinion that was a meager sum. That sum will not be sufficient for the expenses of the Government exposition at Chicago in view of the advance in years and increase in population and industrial affairs generally throughout the country. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts who has reported the bill this morning is right when he says the Government should appropriate one million and a half of dollars.

Again, I will state here, because I wish it to go into the RECORD, that the Government of the United States expended only, at the Philadelphia exposition, the amount I have mentioned. The Government had no expense to meet for entertaining the commissioners appointed by governors of States and Territories, which, in my opinion, was a great neglect in the legislation for the Centennial, but that expense, amounting to many, many thousands of dollars, was paid out of the money which should have gone to the stockholders.

I see in this bill a provision that the expenses of the commissioners are to be paid by the Government, and that I believe to be right. I was placed in a very remarkable position here as between New York and Chicago on the question of the location of this world's fair. The Philadelphia exposition owed neither the State of New York nor the State of Illinois anything in the necessary legislation required, for both of those States, as far as Congress was concerned, were against the proposition. But to-day I stand here hoping that at this session of Congress the United States, so far as she is concerned, will make ample, liberal, adequate appropriations so that at Chicago there will be a great success commensurate with the importance of the occasion and the greatness of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. BELDEN. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I want to say this, that there were not—

Mr. BELDEN. Mr. Speaker, in whose time is the gentleman speaking?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CANDLER] has yielded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania from his time.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. That is correct.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I want to state this, that I do not know what kind of friendship may exist in the minds of members from New York towards the Chicago exposition, but I know how the members from Pennsylvania feel, especially those from the districts embraced in the city of Philadelphia. We feel that our people expect us to aid this great enterprise as much as we can to a successful consummation. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

The SPEAKER. Applause in the galleries can not be permitted.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I feel very sincerely on this question, and for good reasons. I am glad that at the expiration of sixteen years we have risen to a greater eminence, that our country is larger in population and resources, our views more comprehensive; that we are abler financially and otherwise, and that the Congress of the United States can help an enterprise to a greater degree than it did in the years past and gone. At the same time I want to say that Pennsylvania did much for the success of that Centennial Exposition. She contributed $1,000,000 towards the exposition.

The city of Philadelphia contributed a million and a half more, and the stock subscriptions amounted to two and a half millions of dollars, while the Government allowed us to use one and a half millions in addition. And let me say here to the Chicago gentlemen and to the Illinois Representatives, in order that they may not be laboring under a wrong impression as to the difficulty of procuring the necessary means, that it was not until four years after the Centennial was decreed to be held in Philadelphia that the board of finance, which was created also by Congress, came here and asked the help of the Government to the extent of a million and a half of dollars. I beg them to be earnest and constant in getting subscriptions.

For four years the board of finance had made all efforts; the best men in Philadelphia and in the State of Pennsylvania were in its membership, and yet they found at last how difficult it was to get together the large amount of money necessary to meet the vast expenses staring them in the face, the whole cost being nearly $9,000,000; and after all, when Congress saw fit to require that the board of finance should pay back the million and a half of dollars advanced by the Government, the stockholders who subscribed for one share, for ten shares, or fifty shares or more, in all sincerity, for the success of the Centennial, only received a dividend of about 22 per cent. on their subscription. If the Government had allowed the one and a half million of dollars to remain, the stockholders would have been paid in full, probably, out of the receipts of the exposition, the largest receipts, sir, ever derived from any of these great expositions in any country up to 1876. The people of Chicago are undertaking a great work and they must be untiring in their efforts, for the cost will be many millions.

I mention this, Mr. Speaker, because I have said I want success for the sake of my country, and I must say that I was rather pleased that my vote did not, though against it, prevent the selection of the city of Chicago for this exposition. [Applause.] I believe in these people; I believe they are and will be in earnest; I believe they are ready and willing and that they are alive to the situation, and I am sure that if $10,000,000 or more are required it will be forthcoming in proper time. [Applause.] That is my idea and I think the times are such that there can be no doubt of Chicago giving, if necessary, every dollar over and above what is given by the United States Government at the outset to make it a success.

Now, the board of finance of the Philadelphia exposition did present some Congresses ago a memorial to Congress for the repayment to them of this million and one-half of dollars, less the 22 per cent. paid to the stockholders. Perhaps some day justice may be done that board, for we must recollect that New Orleans for her exposition received one million of dollars. When I voted for it I knew they would never be called upon to pay back that million-dollar loan made to them; still I voted for that appropriation, and I repeat the hope that some day justice may be done to the men who made a great success in the city of Philadelphia of the Centennial in 1876.

Mr. Speaker, I should not have voted for the extension of time at Chicago unless I had understood that that was satisfactory to the people there. But I am glad they have extended the time; we learn by experience. There were over two hundred buildings erected in the Centennial grounds at Philadelphia for the purpose of that exposition, magnificent buildings, some of them immense in size, 1,876 feet long, 1,400 feet, 800, 600, and so on; many, many buildings; some erected by the States who sent their commissioners there, and some by foreign Governments. But, sir, this undertaking is a great one, and however many millions it may cost, Chicago, I believe, is good for the amount. [Applause.]

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, the scramble we have had over this bill shows very clearly that so far as the competing cities are concerned it is a simple effort to get and to keep trade—a mere business transaction. And look at it as we may, in any aspect whatever, it resolves itself into a business proposition.

A great industrial exposition is to be held. Government is expected to appropriate for it at least $1,500,000. Three cities enter the lists for the prize, subscribe their millions of dollars, send their lobbyists not only throughout America, but even into foreign countries. They bring to bear upon Congress the influence of literary bureaus and boards of trade. What for? Why, sir, of course with the expectation of pecuniary profit to themselves.

Sir, this exposition is as purely business as is the bargain counter of an enterprising dry-goods firm who advertised recently in this city a great sale of dry goods, cheap for cash, on the tenth anniversary of the partnership. If it were proposed to celebrate this anniversary in a different manner, though I confess it would be going a long way back into history in search of something to stir our hearts, but still, if the scheme were purely patriotic and did not mean taxation, I, for one, would not object; but, sir, it does look like assuming the garb of patriotism to cover up the fact that we are spending money that belongs to all the people in a manner that can benefit only a portion of them.

We are still in the threshold of the second century of our existence. Let us pause and reflect a moment before taking another step in the new career upon which we have started. The Government has only in recent years begun making such appropriations as this. Possibly it is not too late even now to retrace the steps we have taken. Our achievements in the century that is gone were without parallel in human history. During the first eighty-seven years after the adoption of our Constitution not a dollar was expended by our Government for an exposition of this kind. No combination was ever powerful enough in all that time to filch from the Treasury an appropriation to aid an exhibition intended for private benefit.

We had our celebrations: the landing of the Pilgrims, the birthday of Washington, the battle of New Orleans, and, above all, the Declaration of Independence. We celebrated all these—not by elaborate preparations to add to our wealth, for in those days wealth was not the first and last and only consideration—but by music, and fireworks, and poems, and orations. Our anniversary celebrations during these seventy years were, as they professed to be, patriotic.

The farmer left his plow, the blacksmith laid aside his hammer, the merchant shut up his shop, all gave over for a time the pursuit of gain and devoted themselves to the memories of the past, to recalling the valor, the wisdom, the self-denying spirit of those who had sacrificed for the right in the brave old days of the past. If there was a feast at one of these anniversaries no one thought of asking the Government to pay for it. It was furnished by the rich and the well-to-do. The poor came and were welcome.

It was during that period, sir, that we laid the foundations of the greatness of our country. Music, poetry, and oratory were the educators, the vehicles that carried to mind and heart the noblest thoughts that can animate the breast of man. Thus was nursed the patriotism, thus was developed the splendid courage that inspired both the Northern and the Southern armies during the late war, when the soldiers on both sides, all conceiving they were fighting for the Constitution and laws of the fathers, poured out their blood like water and made the great civil war in America a revelation, not only to the world abroad, but to ourselves.

During the first three-quarters of a century of our existence the pet theories of to-day were not in control of the Government, those theories under which monopolies now rule the land. Extravagance in the expenditure of public moneys was not then called liberality; economy was not then denominated parsimony.

The prevailing theory then was that the Government should extend to every citizen the benefit of just and equal laws and that no man should have a bounty at the expense of his brother. In the men reared under such a system the world saw that sturdy independence and that bold and enterprising spirit that have made the American freeman the admiration of mankind.

It was an unfortunate day, sir, when we began to pass away from those old-fashioned celebrations. It was in 1876, the hundredth year from the Declaration of Independence. We had begun to grow rich, and then it occurred to us to take advantage of Independence Day to make to the world a great display of our wealth. It is true that at the Philadelphia Exposition we had an oration and a poem. But these did not constitute the celebration. They were simply opening ceremonies. We devoted three hours to poet and orator and six months to contemplating our present riches and planning schemes for the future.

Instead of worshipping at the shrine of Liberty, the exposition meant worshipping at the shrine of Mammon. Instead of shutting up shop for the whole country opened up shop, displayed the wares we had for sale, established a great national bargain counter. The money loaned by the Government to the city of Philadelphia was afterwards repaid, but we expended there in making an exhibit of the costly collections of the Government $535,803.25. All this expenditure was defended in Congress at the time on the plea that the centennial year was an epoch in our history. We could afford to make an exception, it was said, on the happening of such an event as the hundredth anniversary of American Independence.

Now mark the sequel. Eight years after the centennial a world's industrial exposition was to be held in New Orleans. Money had been appropriated to show the people of the North what costly collections the Government had, and now, on the plea that the turn of the South had come, $299,756.35 were expended to exhibit to the Southern people the grandeur of our Government.

Mr. CARLISLE. One million six hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman from Kentucky says $1,600,000. The figures I have given were those furnished to me by the Treasury Department, and if the Treasury officials have overlooked the fact that the real expense to which the Government was put amounted to $1,600,000—

Mr. CARLISLE. One million six hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. HERBERT. Then that was a serious mistake. They probably overlooked the surety debt the Government was compelled to pay. That makes my argument all the stronger. As we had a surety debt to pay for New Orleans, we are the more apt to have such a debt to pay for Chicago when we stand sponsor for her by this bill. And then, after this New Orleans experience in 1888, to give the people of the West, who were to visit the centennial exposition of the Ohio Valley at Cincinnati a due and proper conception of the riches of the Government by exhibiting to their astonished eyes the wonderful things it has accumulated, we expended the further sum of $147,750.

Now comes this proposition to celebrate the anniversary of the discovery of America by Columbus. As the gentleman from Massachusetts who reported the bill said a few moments ago, this is to be upon a much larger and upon a much more liberal scale than any of those exhibitions which have preceded it. The Government contemplates spending much more money than it did on either of these former occasions.

Gentlemen in control here are getting more and more lavish year by year in expending the money of the people. In spite of the experience of the past the committee report a bill that contemplates a Government expenditure of one million and a half, and no one can tell how much more may result. But the report of the committee this time is not unanimous. Three of the committee, gentlemen of as much business standing as any in this House, gentlemen who are entitled to as much credit as any upon this floor, tell us that this guaranty that the city of Chicago has raised a bona fide subscription of $10,000,000, which seems to be satisfactory to the remainder of the committee, is not satisfactory to them.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if he has read the appendix to the report of the committee?

Mr. HERBERT. I have not.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. I think that, if he would read it and would read the report, and if the House would read it, they would realize how good is the authority the chairman and the committee have for making the statement they do make. I would like—

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman can explain that in his own time, as he has the closing of the debate.

We appointed a committee on this matter, and we look to them for advice and information as to details. Here they come in with a divided opinion as to whether or not the guaranty of ten millions is sufficient. On a plain business proposition like that it ought to be an easy matter to satisfy reasonable business men. Where are there two better business men in the United States than the two gentlemen from New York [Mr. BELDEN and Mr. FLOWER]? Where is there any more reliable gentleman than the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH]? Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CANDLER] tell me that it was impossible for Chicago, if the subscription had been good, if the paper had been gilt-edged, to satisfy these gentlemen? And yet it has not been done. How, then, shall gentlemen expect this House to be satisfied?

What a revelation all this, Mr. Speaker, would have been to the simple-minded men who framed our Constitution. Their dream was a free government and a great people. But that theory is now turned upside down. Everything tends now towards a great and splendid Government and a dependent people. Year by year the Government grows in splendor, while the people, many of them, who support the Government are growing poorer and poorer. The Government is to be sponsor for this exposition. If Chicago does not properly sustain it, gentlemen on this floor who have advocated the scheme will feel bound to uphold it with the public moneys. We are being committed to a show that may cost the people many millions of dollars over and even above the direct, unconditional expenditure of a million and a half.

Mr. Speaker, gentlemen can no longer justify a vote for such a measure as this on the ground that it presents an exceptional case. When once you pass this bill you may put it down as the settled policy of this Government, so far as gentlemen here may have power to settle a policy, that it will aid with direct appropriations every great fair or exposition held in this country and claiming to be international.

At no time in the future will there be any less reason for a Government contribution than now. Even at this moment the disappointed aspirants for this appropriation are looking far into the future for some excuse upon which they can found a claim to a similar appropriation of Government money. An enterprising St. Louis editor has fixed upon 1903 the centennial of the purchase of the Louisiana territory by Jefferson. That is to be St. Louis's opportunity. Then she is to have her international show and her Government appropriation. God help the surplus, and God help the people, if we are to give away their substance in this manner!

Mr. Speaker, pomp and show are natural to aristocratic and monarchical governments. The French people forgot that they had lost their liberty in the splendors of the empire of Napoleon I. They forgot freedom again when they saw Napoleon III and Eugénie ride with their retinue of nobles along the Champs Elysées in their magnificent capital. Where are we going? A republican government is popularly supposed to be noted for its simplicity. Why should we be imitating the splendors of royalty? There was a time when under the Roman republic the people cried out to their rulers for bread and the circus as loudly as they cry out now for Government here to give or help on a show, but that was in its degenerate days, when that great republic was already tottering to its fall.

The remarkable feature is that in Rome it was the mob that cried out Panem et circenses—Bread and the circus. In America it is the rich who cry loudest for Government to appropriate for a celebration that shall eclipse in its magnificence even the Paris Exposition. Gentlemen may say that France is a Republic, but she furnishes no example that we can imitate. France has never yet been able to throw off the trappings of royalty. She has stopped at the half-way station. She still has her nobility, her Orleanists, and her Imperialists; she still has her state-church establishment; she still supports with the people's money the theater and the opera.

Mr. Speaker, I rejoice in whatever adds to the prosperity of the American people or any portion of them, but I have never yet given my consent to the proposition that it is either right or expedient to tax one man for the benefit of another.

What part or lot in this exposition have the farmers of this country, East or West, North or South? They will be expected to make their exhibits, but for what purpose? Why invite the people of foreign countries to see the wonderful products of our soil if the Governments of those foreign countries forbid their people to buy of these products?

France, taught by the example of your Government, interdicts your pork. Germany, following in your footsteps, excludes your food products, and other countries are tending in the same direction. Republican leaders never tire of proclaiming on this floor that American markets must be reserved for Americans. Germany retaliates with, "German markets for Germans." France echoes, "French markets for Frenchmen."

We have been holding here at great expense for months a Pan-American Congress. We invited all these other American Governments to send to Washington delegates empowered to confer with delegates from our Government. The purpose is to see how we can extend our trade. It may result in a proposition for a Government subsidy to steamship lines, in a scheme to take more of the people's money to give to some monopoly, but it will all come to nothing else. If you lock up our markets against the foreigner you must expect him to lock up his markets against you. These South American countries have already caught the inspiration of North American statesmanship and are beginning to impose higher duties on imports.

America, under the rule of the Republican party, is leading in the policy that is shutting up the markets that once were open to whatever products of our farms other countries can produce within their borders, and so it comes to pass that the American farmer is impoverished by the very superabundance of his crops. In the midst of plenty he is becoming poorer every day. He must still sell his surplus abroad—sell for low prices in the restricted markets of the world, sell in competition with all the pauper labor of the world—and yet he is not allowed to buy where he sells. He must buy at home at higher rates. No wonder the prices of agricultural lands are tending downwards.

In New Hampshire recently the commissioner of immigration advertised that 1,422 farms had been abandoned by their owners. The promise was that the system of exclusion was to give our farmers a better and still better home market year by year has proven a delusion and a sham. Take cotton as an example. In the cotton year ending with August, 1869, we exported after supplying the home market 1,465,880 bales of cotton.

In 1879, ten years afterwards, we exported 3,481,004 bales. At the end of another decade we sold abroad 4,742,347 bales. This cotton in the markets of the world must compete with the labor of the world. Year by year we are sending more and more of it abroad, and yet gentlemen seek to delude the men who produce it with the idea that the Government of the United States can give them relief by furnishing them with a home market. That home market, as the figures show, is more insufficient now than it was twenty years ago.

There never was so much complaint among the farmers of the country as there is to-day. And they have cause to complain. They are now feeling in its full force the effect of the unjust and partial, the unfair and extravagant legislation for which the Republican party is responsible. Stop this extravagance. Reduce custom-house taxations. Allow him who is obliged to sell in the markets of the world some of the benefits to be derived from buying in those same markets. This way is open and plain if we can only unite the farmers of the country to rise up as one man and break the bonds in which the Republican party has bound and delivered them into the hands of the monopolists. But instead of giving him this poor privilege the great Ways and Means Committee of this House is now busy devising new schemes to increase taxation. That committee is expected to report a bill that will raise taxes on article after article of common necessity.

Not even the tin cup of the laborer is to escape; at least, that is the present programme. A monopoly has been formed beforehand, although not a pound of tin-plate is now manufactured in America. A combination has already been made; the lobbyists who compose it call themselves the American Tin-Plate Association. They have associated themselves together first to get the tax imposed, and secondly to manufacture and control the product afterwards. Thus the tin that goes into every cup and bucket and pan in the United States, every pound of it, is to pay tribute to this monopoly by anticipation that is here at our doors demanding this increased tax; and this is only a sample.

This same expected tariff bill, the newspapers say, is to lay a tax on hides. That is undoubtedly the programme now. Whether the committee will be able to stand by such a monstrous provision nobody can tell. There is a protest going up against it all over the land. I add my protest now. Look at the facts. No industry in this country has prospered more in the last fourteen years than the leather industry. It is finding its way south. Under the provision for free hides there is a flourishing shoe factory in the district I have the honor to represent. Other factories are contemplated. Shall these be crushed by high-priced leather? We are now making in the United States more than we consume of leather goods, exporting more than we import. Leather goods are the one manufactured article to be bought as cheaply in America as in Europe; but it is proposed to tax hides, and that will raise the price of boots and shoes, a necessity to everybody.

No wonder there is a spirit of unrest among the farmers. No wonder they are coming together to find out the causes of their distress. I do hope, sir, they will look at this legislation. They are taxed for the benefit of everybody else. This is legislation for the classes and against the masses; so is your legislation for a world's fair, and for a grand national park in Wyoming, and for a great zoological garden in the city of Washington, and for the great Memorial Columbus park, up here yesterday.

These things, sir, and all kindred schemes, though they may gratify national vanity, though they may seem to add to the splendor of your Government, are heaping taxation on the people and teaching the citizen to look to the Government instead of himself. The doctrines that are being taught by the American capitalist to-day and by the Republicans in this Congress are tending directly, as surely as cause leads to effect, towards socialism and its twin brother, communism.

If the Government can help the people by giving or aiding great expositions; if it can help science by taking geology and paleontology under its wing, or by researches into electricity and magnetism, as it is doing; or if it can add to the price of the labor of one class of people by enacting that other people shall pay higher prices for their goods, all of which I deny; if beneficial results follow all these laws, as is contended, why not, as Edward Bellamy and his socialist friends contend, go further? Why not have Government take full control—regulate your farming, your mining, your manufacturing, your cooking, and your washing?

How shall you stop, sir, when once you have started in that direction? Socialism, the telegraph tells us, is rapidly spreading in Germany. It may be that this is the cause of the downfall of Bismarck; that the Emperor was dissatisfied with his great chancellor because he has failed to check the socialist party. The successes of that party in the recent elections for the Reichstag have startled the world.

But they are perfectly natural, sir. German statesmen have taught the doctrine that, instead of relying on individual enterprise and energy, the government, to secure the happiness of Germany, must control and build up the industries of the country. Its hand must be everywhere felt. In Bavaria government even brews the beer. The socialists are simply carrying out the teachings of German statesmen to their logical conclusion. So in France.

From the days of Louis XIV down to the present government there has controlled everything, sustaining by taxation the church and the theater, regulating in the minutest details the butcher and the baker. If the Government can do everything the few may wish, why shall it not do everything a hungry mob in a city can demand? And France has furnished the most frightful examples of communism, anarchy, and bloodshed that history has recorded; and, sir, socialism is manifesting itself in many parts of our own country.

If we would check this tendency, if we would maintain and preserve inviolate the homes that are at once the pride and the blessing of a free people, let us turn our faces towards the ways in which our fathers trod; let us give to every man the benefit of just and equal laws; let us teach the citizen the true spirit of independence, and that the pretended benefactions of the Government are simply robbing him of the right to do as he may please with that which is his own.

I would not, sir, strike down any interest in this country. I would favor no radical or revolutionary measures; but, sir, I would turn the face of this Government in a different direction. I would have legislation hereafter look towards lower taxes, towards the lightening of the onerous customs duties that now weigh down our people, not to the adding of new burdens. Let us have justice for all, exclusive privileges for none.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Illinois. What became of the cattle industry when they took off the tariff?

Mr. HERBERT. It was just where it is now. It got into the hands of the big operators in Chicago. Are you doing anything to get it out of their hands?

Mr. TAYLOR, of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. STRUBLE. Mr. Speaker, is it the world's fair bill that we are discussing or the tariff? [Laughter.]

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the question is on the amendment which I offered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN].

The question was taken, and the amendment of Mr. McMILLIN was rejected.

Mr. CARLISLE. I ask the gentleman [Mr. FLOWER] to yield to me to offer an amendment to the sixteenth section, which the gentleman from Tennessee proposed to strike out.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have sent up an amendment which I suppose is entitled to priority.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will be first in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have modified the amendment so as to limit the amount for which the Government shall be liable to $1,000,000, instead of $1,500,000, as proposed by the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 17 after the word "aggregate" in line 17 and insert in lieu thereof the words "one million dollars."

The amendment was not agreed to, there being—ayes 36, noes 56.

Mr. CARLISLE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 16 the following:

"The Secretary of the Treasury shall cause the said building or buildings to be constructed as far as possible of iron, steel, and glass, or of such other material as may be taken out and sold to the best advantage; and he is authorized and required to dispose of such building and buildings or the material composing the same, at the close of the exposition, giving preference to the city of Chicago or to the said World's Exposition of 1892 to purchase the same at an appraised value, to be ascertained in such a manner as he may determine."

Several MEMBERS. All right.

Mr. CARLISLE. I desire to say but a single word—

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. We are willing to accept that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. I offer an amendment which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 17 add the following:

"And provided further, That if in the conduct of said World's Fair a dividend should be declared, the amount contributed by the United States Government shall receive its pro rata share thereof."

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEWART] mistakes the provisions of this bill. It does not contemplate any partnership of the Government in the financial operations of the exposition. This appropriation by Congress is entirely for the Government's own building; and there is nothing out of which a dividend could be paid to the Government.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. STEWART, of Georgia, it was rejected.

Mr. FLOWER. Mr. Speaker, as I have computed the time, I believe I have used sixty-nine minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is very nearly right.

Mr. FLOWER. I reserve the rest of my time.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS].

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago I appealed upon this floor for fair play for New York. To-day I appeal to this House for fair play to Chicago. [Applause.] New York had fair play on this floor. She lost this fight through treachery in her own ranks. There was a Benedict Arnold in her army. No "Jockey of Norfolk" received a warning before her natural geographical allies in New England and Pennsylvania were led into the ranks of the enemy. But she had fair play upon this floor.

When I was a school-boy I saw two boys fighting. It was a stiff quarrel and a good fight. One boy whipped the other. The boy that was whipped picked up a stone and hit his opponent in the neck, after his back was turned. Now, I do not know what kind of boys you have in this House; but I am not that kind of a boy. [Applause.]

I say there was a fair fight on this floor. We met the enemy, and we are theirs. We were handsomely whipped.

Now, what are we going to do about it? Why, sir, we ought to act a manly part. What is a manly part? Let us see. After selecting Chicago as a site for the fair, we referred this matter to a committee for adjustment. The subcommittee of that committee have voted unanimously in favor of this bill. They are satisfied with the pledges given by Chicago. The large majority of the committee are satisfied with those pledges. If that committee are satisfied with the pledges they have received, we ought to be satisfied. They know more about it than I do. I am satisfied.

I stand by that committee. I stand by them because I believe it is manly to do so. I stand by them because I believe it is my duty as a member of Congress from the city of New York to do so. I stand by them because I believe I am right in doing so. And I may add, Mr. Speaker, that I stand by that committee because I believe it is politic to do so.

We are not the only branch of the National Legislature to consider this project. The Senate is to have its "innings." The Senate must express its opinion and pass upon this measure. The action of the Senate may be unfavorable to Chicago. If so, then New York can again enter the lists with honor. If that time ever comes the battle may again be fought. Then we may say with Dessau at Marengo, "The battle is completely lost; but there is time and opportunity to win another."

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. I yield the gentleman a minute longer.

Mr. CUMMINGS. If that time does not come I consider that I honor myself, honor my city, honor my State, and honor my country by standing by Chicago and doing all that can be done to aid her in making this fair a success. [Applause.] I shall vote against the amendment because I think it unjust to Chicago to postpone the measure longer. She needs every minute for preparation. Even the seconds are golden. Give the fair fair play.

Mr. LAWLER. That is the spirit that will make it a grand success.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Speaker, I think it would have been well if the gentleman who has just taken his seat had withheld somewhat at least of his animadversion in respect to the struggles of New York for gaining this fair. Whatever the troubles were in New York or in Albany, there is one thing to be said in vindication of the honor of the Representatives of that State: that on the floor of Congress New York's Representatives stood solidly together and fought till the last; and when we are conquered we are generous enough to walk into the enemy's camp and share their rations. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from St. Louis [Mr. FRANK].

Mr. FRANK. Nothing, in my judgment, Mr. Speaker, should be done to retard the progress or imperil the success of the commemoration of this great historic event in the city of Chicago. The pride of the State of Illinois, the integrity of the city of Chicago and her people, as well as the honor of this entire country, are involved in this affair.

I did not stop to inquire what consideration prompted this House in declaring in favor of Chicago as the proper site for the holding of this fair. It was sufficient for me this House had declared in favor of that city as against all other competitors. I then said, as a member of this committee and as a member of this House, I should do all in my power to aid Chicago in making this fair a complete success; that all my efforts would be zealously exerted in that direction.

And I intend, gentlemen, to stand by that promise. All I asked of Chicago or demanded of her people was that she should accept the provisions of the bill and carry out its requirements in good faith, as I pledged the people of St. Louis would do if she had been the successful competitor for its location.

It is quite true it would not have strained my people as it seems to strain the people of Chicago, because my people are accustomed to observe the terms of an agreement by a standard of honor than which there is none higher anywhere the sun shines.

Chicago has recorded her promises. To violate them would be her everlasting disgrace, and in this matter would be humiliating to the whole country. She does not intend to do it. She is now prompted by what she has heard on this floor, by patriotic impulse, to make this fair a grand and colossal success. [Applause.] All the provisions of the bill are surrounded by proper safeguards.

I trust this measure will now pass, so we can say to Chicago: "On with the work!" [Renewed applause.]

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. I yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Speaker, after the eloquent speech of my friend from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] and the appropriate remarks of my friend from St. Louis [Mr. FRANK] there is not much for me to say, and I wish 4 o'clock, the time fixed for closing the debate, had come, so that we might vote on the bill. [Applause.]

I am one of those who advocated Chicago at the beginning as a proper place to locate the world's fair. I have had no cause since I first cast my vote for Chicago to lessen my ardor or to lose confidence in the Queen City of the Lakes.

For nearly three months we have considered in committee and in the House of Representatives the holding of a world's fair to commemorate the greatest event of modern times, and we must not now halt or hesitate, but go forward with the good work. In a fair contest and in an honorable struggle Chicago was victorious. Friends of New York or St. Louis or Washington are now estopped in interposing unnecessary and improper obstacles.

I believe all who are in favor of a world's fair are now honorably bound to stand by Chicago and do all that is proper to have the most attractive, the most conspicuous, and the grandest international exhibition of arts, industries, products, minerals, and manufactures ever held in the world.

The people of Chicago, with an unanimity unparalleled and an enthusiasm unequalled, are ready to do their duty. They offered a larger and more generous contribution to the world's fair than was ever proffered before by private citizens or by any foreign government for the great international exhibitions previously held. In the financial plan for the great Paris exposition, which was perhaps the most successful world's fair ever held, the contributions aggregated $8,600,000.

The city of Chicago has now $5,000,000 available for present use, and guaranties to satisfy the commission that it will provide, without the aid of the United States Government, $5,000,000 more, making $10,000,000, which is in every respect abundant, for I believe that our world's fair will pay its own expenses and be a good investment.

No person who knows the enterprising, progressive, and earnest people of Chicago can doubt that the fair, if held at that city, will be a grand success, and when we are assured by the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] that he has examined the subscriptions to the world's fair fund for Chicago and that they are bona fide and will be paid, and when such men as Lyman J. Gage, president of the First National Bank of Chicago; John B. Drake, proprietor Grand Pacific Hotel; G. B. Shaw, president Merchant Loan and Trust Company; C. L. Hutchinson, president Corn Exchange National Bank; John C. Black, president Continental National Bank; W. E. Hale, president Hale Elevator Company; Potter Palmer, proprietor Palmer House; E. G. Keith, president Metropolitan National Bank; H. F. Eames, president Commercial National Bank; A. L. Patterson, Chicago Globe; W. J. Huiskamp, Chicago Times; William T. Baker, president Chicago Board of Trade; William Penn Nixon, Chicago Inter-Ocean; John N. Clark, collector of customs; O. W. Potter, president Illinois Steel Company; James W. Scott, Chicago Herald; Joseph Medill, Chicago Tribune; Stuyvesant Fish, president Illinois Central Railroad Company; J. W. Doane, president Merchants' Loan and Trust Company, and others pledge their hearty support and declare that Chicago will be equal to every demand, I feel satisfied that there is no longer any ground for cavil or complaint and that Chicago can be fully trusted in the grand commemoration of the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America.

Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the passage of the bill reported by the committee with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE]. I was opposed to a United States corporation to manage the world's fair, but an Illinois corporation, with a commission consisting of two persons appointed by the governors of the respective States, is the best. I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CANDLER].

The pluck and promptness of Chicago in preparing to hold the fair in 1892 is very commendable, but we should look at this question from a business as well as from a patriotic standpoint.

Columbus discovered America on the 12th of October, 1492. If we are to celebrate the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America we should not commence before that time, and that will be too late for an international exposition to be held in the year 1892. Therefore, I am in favor of inaugurating the world's fair on the 12th of October, 1892, and at that time we should dedicate the buildings with proper ceremonies, but the great exposition of our arts, industries, manufactures, and the products of the mine, the soil, and sea should commence in the spring of 1893.

Thus will our world's fair become a greater success, thus it will be of greater national and international advantage, thus it will stimulate the patriotism and promote the material prosperity of our people, and thus, too, our country will be crowned with the wreath which represents progress and pre-eminence, individual achievements, and national success. [Applause.]

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. I reserve the balance of my time and yield the floor to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FLOWER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has occupied one hour and seventeen minutes on that side.

Mr. FLOWER. How much belongs to the opposition to the bill?

The SPEAKER. About forty minutes.

Mr. FLOWER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH].

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I will use even as much as the five minutes accorded to me by the gentleman from New York. I was not present at the committee meeting this morning and was not aware of this division of time.

I simply desire to state to the House now that when the contest was presented for the location of this fair I was an earnest supporter of the claims of the city of St. Louis. I gave then at length my reasons for supporting St. Louis to the House and to the country. When the bill was sent back to the committee to be perfected and reported to the House under the resolution the contest, as far as the site was concerned, was settled. The question was then as to the best means of protecting the country and to see that Chicago, having secured the location of the fair, would comply in good faith with every proposition made by its advocates on this floor pending the discussion of that measure.

I took the position before the committee that Chicago had not complied in good faith with the promises made by its advocates in this House in regard to the subscription and guaranty fund. I insisted that Chicago should present to that committee unquestioned evidence of the soundness and legality of that subscription. I was in a minority. The majority of the committee decided that upon the evidence presented to the committee they were satisfied with the guaranty fund, and especially when they had adopted an amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], which is now a part of the bill, that before the fair should be inaugurated or notice thereof given to foreign countries by the President of the United States, by his proclamation, he should be satisfied of the good faith and absolute soundness of the guaranty fund of $10,000,000. With that I am today content and satisfied.

While it was not the plan I proposed, I accepted gracefully and in good faith the action of the majority of the committee; and there is nothing left for us or for Congress to do at this time but to extend to the city of Chicago every fair and reasonable legislative facility for making the fair what it should be, a grand national success. [Applause.] And to that end I will go as far as any gentleman on the floor of this House.

Mr. FLOWER. Mr. Speaker, I am one of that unfortunate minority of the Committee on the World's Fair who believe that Chicago did not put up the necessary subscription before our committee; and I agree fully in everything that my colleague from New York, Mr. BELDEN, has said in regard to the subscription list from that city. I will say further that there is no heading to that subscription list; and I will go still further and say that the mayor of Chicago did not know how to head it in a telegram to a member of the committee or to make it fit the lists we have in the committee.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Illinois. Oh, well, he is a Democrat. [Laughter.] Mr. FLOWER. But I will not say that they can not raise $5,000,000, because I believe that Chicago can raise $5,000,000 or $10,000,000. But I do not believe that on that subscription list they furnished to the committee they have raised it. I believe that on the subscription list there is more than one and one-half million dollars subscribed by corporations; and the gentlemen ought to know, if they do not, that under the decisions of the supreme court of the State of Illinois the corporations who subscribed are likely to forfeit their charters by subscribing for stock in any corporation.

Now, I do not say but that Chicago can get around that, because she is a smart city. But I do say, suppose that she does not get around it, what are we to do when the President finds out that Chicago can not raise the necessary funds?

Mr. TAYLOR, of Illinois. Then we will send it to New York.

Mr. FLOWER. We do not want it then. We believe in playing fair. We made a fair and square fight with you and you won it. As my colleague from New York stated, the committee generally was not called to meet these Chicago people; but I say that outside of the committee-room they were asked to get that subscription list and show that they had the $5,000,000 fund. They were asked to get a certified copy of it, because we told them that if they should get their bill through the House they might have trouble in the Senate. I said that to them in all kindness myself—in kindness to the city of Chicago—and I say to you now that that is essential.

I shall vote for the amendment of my colleague [Mr. BELDEN], therefore, to recommit this bill with instructions to the committee to show a subscription list; and, failing in that motion, I shall vote for the fair, because I believe in it, and I believe that Chicago can raise the $10,000,000 and satisfy the country.

There has never been a time since the debate began that I have had a doubt that Chicago, when she leveled herself right down to the work, could get the money and make the fair a success, and I believe so now. But I think she has got a hard road to travel; and I would like to have her show first that she is able to do what she undertakes. That is what I am after, and that is all. I am fearful—yet I may be mistaken—I am fearful that at the other end of the Capitol when they call upon Chicago to furnish the subscription list they may take the same view of it; and therefore I wanted that subscription list left with our committee. That would have been conclusive of their ability to do what they undertook. But it was not left.

I yield three minutes now to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE].

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I have very little to say on the pending bill and very little time in which to say it. The proviso at the end of the seventeenth section should be stricken out entirely. It recites that the Government shall not be liable for more than a million five hundred thousand dollars, to be used to pay the world's fair commissioners, to erect buildings for the Government exhibits, and to pay the expenses of transporting and caring for such exhibits.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] undertook to amend the section by reducing the amount to $1,000,000, but the amendment was rejected.

This proviso is a delusion and a snare. It is an imposition on the House and the country and ought to be eliminated from the bill. If the friends of the measure, the patriotic advocates of a world's fair to be held under the direction of the United States Government, were disposed to deal fairly and candidly with the people, they would amend the proviso by striking out $1,500,000 and insert $5,000,000; because it will cost the Government every cent of five millions of the people's money to discharge the obligations which the Government will incur if this bill becomes a law. I will not offer such an amendment for the reason that I am unwilling that Congress should appropriate a single dollar of public money to pay for this Chicago show, this picnic.

But the House seems determined to bind the Government to participate in this exposition, a scheme to promote the business interests of the people of a great city at the expense of the tax-payers of the country, and it ought to be honest enough and courageous enough to let the country know the amount of money likely to be used in that scheme. There is a pretense in this bill to limit the amount to a million and a half dollars. At the same time every member of this House knows that no such limitation can be imposed by Congress. The next Congress, or this Congress at its next session, or during this session, can disregard this pretended limitation and appropriate five millions or any other sum of money to carry out the purposes of the bill if it should become a law.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. KILGORE. I can not yield to the gentleman from Illinois. I have very little time.

Mr. MASON. I want to ask the gentleman from Texas one question.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, sir, I will yield for just one question.

Mr. MASON. Do you want to fix this bill or any other bill so that any future Congress shall not extend the limit of the appropriation?

Mr. KILGORE. You propose in this bill to fix a limit on Congress. You say the Government shall not be liable for more than a million and a half dollars, and that is what I am now objecting to. You are not acting in good faith with the people. You know that no such limitation can be imposed on future Congresses by the proviso which I have recited. It is so much waste paper, and ought to be stricken out.

The bill prima facie affords conclusive reasons why such limit does not fix the maximum amount of the money necessary to pay the expenses incurred by the Government. The bill authorizes the appointment of 106 commissioners and 106 alternate commissioners to be named in thirty days after the law is passed, and to continue in office till the 1st of January, 1898, a period of seven years and six months about. Their pay is $6 per day and transportation. Their per diem amounts to $636. Then there are other, and indeed necessary, expenses of that august commission. It will be compelled to have stationery, fuel, rooms, clerks innumerable, and type-writers, and I am actually informed that a type-writer is a very expensive luxury. I have never been able to afford one myself. [Great laughter.]

I hope the House will not consume too much of my limited time with laughter and applause. [Renewed laughter.] Taking everything into consideration, the expenses of this commission will not be less than $700 or $800 per day, and this to continue in existence about seven and one-half years; and they will always be on hand to draw pay. If one dies, or resigns, or fails to act, an alternate is provided for in the bill; hence there will never be a vacancy in the commission when it comes to drawing pay. We may reasonably conclude that this commission alone will cost the Government two million and a half of dollars. Then the bill appropriates besides $400,000 for buildings in which the Government is expected to place its exhibits and $200,000 for the transportation and care of the Government exhibits—all ostensibly for a patriotic purpose, really in fact in the interest of private speculation.

I want, in conclusion, to repeat and emphasize the declaration that if this bill becomes a law and the exposition is held at Chicago, as contemplated by the bill, the people of the United States will be out $5,000,000 before it is done with, possibly much more. But, indeed, this is not the worst feature of the measure.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. KILGORE. I would like to have just one minute more—

Mr. FLOWER. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINOLA].

Mr. SPINOLA. Mr. Speaker, I wish I could agree with all that my friends from New York have stated on this question to-day. This is a peculiar position we find ourselves in. The leading gentleman from Illinois, when this question was before the House to fix the location where the fair should be held, told the House that under no circumstances would Chicago ask for more than $650,000. They now ask to put the limit in the bill at a million and a half. Gentlemen forget that the surplus is melting away. I am going to keep calling your attention to it from day to day.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. Why did you not do so when the Frémont bill was under consideration?

Mr. SPINOLA. Why, will you cast one single slur at the character of the old soldier and great American explorer, General Frémont, in this way?

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. No, sir.

Mr. SPINOLA. You have done so by your question, and I hurl it back with contempt. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. From the foot of the throne.

Mr. SPINOLA. Now, sir, when before this House asking to locate this fair at the city of New York, I will repeat briefly what I stated then:

New York will erect all the buildings for the fair, including the Government buildings provided for in the bill as reported by the committee. The imperial city of New York will do all that may be necessary without any Government aid of any kind, either in money or Government guaranties. Therefore, no Government help is necessary for the organization or management of the fair in the city of New York.

That was the position New York occupied. We asked you to accept it. The majority vote of this House decided otherwise. And how did they decide it? Based upon the assertions of the gentlemen from Illinois that they had already secured a bona fide and absolute subscription of $5,000,000. Now it turns out, when asked to produce their subscription list, that they failed to do it. There is a doubt about your list, and it leaves it without any certainty that the $5,000,000 even will be subscribed by the city of Chicago. Five million dollars will not be sufficient to hold the fair. You will have to have at least $15,000,000 before it is sure and certain.

Suppose the subscription is bona fide and every man were to pay up his subscription, where does the other $10,000,000 come from? You are asking us now to give you an entering-wedge in getting the million and a half. In my judgment, if it goes on and we give authority to establish this fair at Chicago as it stands in this bill, if it passes, then you will come back to us and say in the most bland and fascinating way, "Gentlemen, you must give us a few millions more, just to grease the thing along with." That will be the application made to this House. If this subscription is a genuine one why have they failed to show it? New York had one and made it up of her very best citizens and her wealthiest people, engaged in the greatest industries within her limits, and then again the city itself said, "We will furnish you ten millions additional in hard money."

What we want from Chicago now is hard cash. Unlock your strong box and let us look at the money; if you have got it, then I will say amen to you, and will not put my vote in the way of the passage of this bill. But I want to see some proof of the fact, and up to this time you have failed to furnish us any proof that you have got the spelter. Now, I agree with all that has been said in a complimentary way about Chicago. I know they are a nimble people out there, active and pushing. They have almost all of them got rich, and, from what I learn, a great many of them who have got their wealth in their pockets intend to keep it there and do not propose to waste any of it on this fair. [Laughter.] That is the information that comes to us. To be sure a few distinguished gentlemen have been mentioned by my friend from Kentucky, but that does not represent one-tenth of Chicago. One bank there, we are informed, has got $20,000,000 on deposit. That bank is not going to open its doors for the benefit of this fair. Not much. That bank and its twenty millions belong to the people who have put the money there, and they will not consent to have it taken out to be wasted upon this enterprise.

The gentleman has got a list of a few bankers. I do not deny that; but those bankers have not subscribed $5,000,000, or if they have the Representatives of Chicago have failed to produce the subscription list. It is like going to buy a bill of goods. You go to the largest merchant in America and represent you are worth $10,000,000, and he sells you goods to the amount of $5,000,000, and finally it turns out that you are not worth $1,000,000; that is a case of getting goods under false pretenses, and this looks to me very much like that.

Mr. LAWLER. We will accept this bill and live up to it.

Mr. SPINOLA. My friend says they will accept this bill and live up to it. I know he will, so far as he is concerned, because he is sincere; he is a friend of Chicago; he lives there, and the people have been kind to him, and he has been kind and true to them, and I hope they will both continue their relations for many long years. [Laughter and applause.] Mr. Speaker, I have no fault to find with any of the gentlemen from Illinois. They are doing what I would probably try to do if I lived there. I do not find fault with what they say about Chicago, but I do find fault with their coming here and making statements which they can not verify. Up to this time they have failed to prove that they have got even $2,000,000 of actual subscriptions. There is no written proof of it, no written evidence of it, and I am waiting for my smiling friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to produce the proof.

Mr. SPRINGER. When my time comes I will produce it.

Mr. SPINOLA. Will you go back to your original proposition of $850,000?

Mr. SPRINGER. I have nothing to do with the Government exhibit. You can do what you like about that.

Mr. SPINOLA. My dear friend, that was not your statement. Your statement, standing here in this aisle, was that the Government would not be asked to appropriate more than $650,000 for Government exhibits and everything connected therewith.

Mr. LAWLER. He was looking for votes then. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPINOLA. I know he was looking for votes, and that comes under the principle which I illustrated awhile ago of buying goods under false pretenses. That is another argument in the same line and I am sorry it comes from so honest a gentleman as my friend in front of me [Mr. LAWLER]. They must not make such statements. [Laughter.] Let us have the proofs and let us stand by the proofs and the facts. My friend says further that if Chicago fails to get the money they will give the fair to New York. Sir, New York does not want it. Now we have had our day in court and now quit.

Mr. MASON (laughing). My friend must excuse me for smiling.

Mr. SPINOLA. Certainly; and I may some day smile with you. [Laughter.]

I say that under the circumstances New York does not want it. We gave you a gallant battle for it, and if you had not represented that you had $5,000,000 when you did not have over one million in reality, we would have beaten you.

Mr. MASON. We have got the five million.

Mr. RAINES. Will my friend yield for a question?

Mr. SPINOLA. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAINES. Does not my friend consider it fortunate that we were beaten, from the fact that if things go on in New York as they are going now, by the time we were ready to go to work we should have lost a good part of the Tammany managers of the fair, as they would have been inside of Ludlow street jail or some other such place?

Mr. SPINOLA. My dear sir, try to keep yourself out of jail if you can. You will be lucky if you succeed. [Laughter and applause.] The gentleman's question is another feeble attempt to inject politics into this matter. [Laughter.] I thought the gentleman from New York knew me better. He seems to have lost sight of me since other days.

Mr. RAINES. Oh, no; I remember you very well.

Mr. SPINOLA. Yes, sir; and I think after to-day your memory will be refreshed, and many others of your kind remember me, too.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOWER. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York has insisted that Chicago has not given any proof of the fact that a bona fide subscription has been made to the corporation to erect buildings for the world's fair. If the gentleman will look on page 9 of the report of the committee on this bill he will find that that subscription list was verified to the satisfaction of the committee by the signatures of Mr. Lyman J. Gage, who is vice-president and general manager of the First National Bank, the largest banking-house west of the Alleghany Mountains, and of Mr. Otto Young, one of the most prominent business men and merchants in the city of Chicago, and also by Senator FARWELL, of that State, who addressed the following note to the chairman of this committee:

UNITED STATES SENATE, Washington, D. C., March 19, 1890.

DEAR SIR: I have examined the list of the subscriptions to the world's fair-fund for Chicago, and desire to say to you that they are bona fide and will be paid.

Yours, very truly,

C. B. FARWELL.

Hon. J. W. CANDLER,
Chairman World's Fair Committee.

Mr. BELDEN. Did Mr. FARWELL ever see the subscription?

Mr. SPRINGER. He did.

Mr. BELDEN. Did he ever see the twenty-seven hundred names?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir, he did not; and it is not necessary that he should have seen them.

Mr. BELDEN. How much did they represent?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will tell you how much they represent by reference to this report; you will find it in these two exhibits which I now hold in my hand—Exhibits A and B. Here are the names of gentlemen who have subscribed $4,361,000 to this corporation, and if members desire to look at these names they will find among them those of the most prominent gentlemen in Chicago, including such names as Marshall Field & Co., John V. Farwell & Co., and George M. Pullman, of the Pullman Palace Car Company. These subscriptions show how much these gentlemen have pledged themselves for in money, and Mr. Gage has certified that the original papers of the subscription are in the vaults of the committee in Chicago.

How much more proof do you want? If we were dealing with men whom we suspected of "salting" mines or selling bogus silver bricks, if we were dealing with persons whom we regarded as confidence men, not to be trusted, we would have asked them to bring in some affidavit, some sworn statement, with the seal of a court. But that is not the kind of gentlemen we were dealing with. These are gentlemen who stand in the very foremost rank among the financiers and capitalists of this country, gentlemen whose word is good for millions, and whose checks would be honored for any amount for which they might be given.

These honorable, responsible gentlemen have said—and they know what this subscription is—that it is ample for the amount each man has subscribed.

Mr. BELDEN. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; I can not yield now.

In addition to that these gentlemen state that they will furnish $5,000,000 more than the capital stock of this company, making in all $10,000,000; and the bill provides that this fair shall not be announced to be held until this commission to be appointed by the President, two members from each State and Territory, two from the District of Columbia, and eight from the country at large (only two commissioners coming from the State of Illinois) shall be satisfied of the sufficiency of this fund.

Not only that, but the President of the United States himself is to pass upon the same question before inviting the nations of the earth to participate in this fair, before giving it any recognition whatever.

What more do you want? Do you suppose that the city of Chicago, which desires this fair so much, which has made so honorable and stupendous an effort to secure it, is going to allow the enterprise to lapse into desuetude? Not at all. It will be a success; the gentlemen whose names are subscribed to this paper will make it the grandest fair that ever was held in this country or in any other. Their honor is pledged, their money is pledged; they are able to carry out their promises. Does any gentleman on this floor believe that these honorable and responsible gentlemen have been playing with Congress; that they have come here as confidence men to deceive us; that they came before our committee and submitted these papers for the purpose of committing a fraud upon a committee of this House and upon members here? To doubt the genuineness of this subscription is to impute dishonesty to this committee and to the honorable gentlemen of Chicago who came here and gave us their personal assurances and their written statements that these subscriptions are bona fide and will be paid.

Mr. BELDEN. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BELDEN. I see that the first name on Exhibit A is "E. St. John, $395,000." Will the gentleman tell us whether Mr. St. John subscribed that amount?

Mr. SPRINGER. He subscribed that amount in behalf of those whom he represents.

Mr. BELDEN. Did he sign any subscription for $395,000?

Mr. SPRINGER. He is responsible; he put his name there for that sum.

Mr. BELDEN. Is his name signed to any subscription for that amount?

Mr. SPRINGER. His name has been signed for that much of the sum.

Mr. BELDEN. Did he sign that subscription for $395,000?

Mr. SPRINGER. You see it there.

Mr. BELDEN. I do not; I see a copy or what purports to be a copy.

You have seen the subscription, and I ask you if he signed it.

Mr. MASON (to Mr. BELDEN). Let me ask you a question. Do you think the people of Chicago are confidence men? You speak of a paper which you say "purports to be a copy." Do you pretend to stand before the people of the country and doubt the honor and responsibility of these gentlemen from Chicago? Do you mean to intimate that we are furnishing you a "copy" the original of which does not exist? Do you pretend—

Mr. BELDEN. I say a representative of Chicago in the person of Mr. SPRINGER told me he had not subscribed it.

Mr. MASON. Who had not?

Mr. BELDEN. E. St. John.

Mr. SPRINGER. The fact is that Mr. St. John is president of the Chicago and Rock Island Railroad Company, and was chairman of a committee to call upon certain railroad companies to ascertain how much they would give. He reported to the finance committee that he had raised this sum of money, and he put his name down as responsible for it. He will be responsible; do not be at all concerned about that.

Mr. MASON. I want just one minute, if I can have it.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. I yield two minutes to the gentleman, and only two minutes.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I only desire to say one word in reply to the general tone of debate this afternoon on the part of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELDEN]. We did expect you were sorry and sore when you were defeated, but when you said you would try to help to make this world's fair a success at Chicago, we thought you meant it. [Laughter.] But we do not think it this afternoon. [Laughter and applause.]

"Fair play is a jewel," and the gentleman is very hard pushed when he attempts to throw discredit and dishonor upon the people of Chicago by holding up before the House a paper saying, "It is not the original; it is a mere copy," as though we were sending a forged or fraudulent paper, as though we were tramps. [Laughter and applause.]

The honor of Chicago, the national honor, is at stake.

If this fair is not a success by reason of this proceeding, New York will be as much disgraced as we are. [Applause.] We have as much as we can do to make it a success; but we will do it. [Applause.] All we ask is that this House will give us the bill which the committee have reported. We will comply with the terms on the part of Congress and endeavor to make it a success. When it is a success it will redound to the honor, not only of Chicago, not only to the honor of the Northwest, but to the honor of every man who voted to give us the opportunity and reposed trust and confidence in the city of Chicago. [Applause.]

Do what the committee has reported in favor of Chicago. You have no right to hold up papers here and say they are "mere copies," as though there was some foul play intended. If you are going to help us, show it by your acts, but do not rise up here before the people and attempt to throw odium upon this whole matter by alleging this is merely a copy of a paper, as though the original did not exist.

For myself, Mr. Speaker, standing before the country, if Chicago is to get that fair, I want it to get it in a way that would be satisfactory and honorable. There is something more valuable than a world's fair, and that is the honor of that city. If we have the world's fair at Chicago under the provisions of the bill reported by the committee, it will be a success. We intend to make it a success. [Applause.] If, however, the business men of Chicago, in order to secure this fair, are to be placed on a level with tramps and mendicants, we do not want the fair at that price, and you can place it somewhere else. If you are men, be fair; if school-boys, continue as you now are going.

Mr. BELDEN. I desire to say to the gentleman from Illinois that what New York promised to do, she did.

Mr. MASON. Still sticking about New York, I see. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BELDEN. In the list of subscriptions on the part of New York the names were given and the amounts subscribed.

Mr. MASON. You have it in your hands, I suppose.

Mr. BELDEN. No.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has not the right to interrupt the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BELDEN. On the list of the city of New York there were twenty-seven thousand names given, with the amounts, but on this paper, presented in behalf of Chicago, you do not give a name. If I had my way I should not give you any of it.

Mr. MASON rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will not interrupt. Gentlemen will take their seats.

Mr. MASON. I will take my seat.

Mr. FLOWER. I will yield now for three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINOLA].

Mr. SPINOLA rose.

Mr. FLOWER. How much time has the gentleman from Massachusetts left?

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. I will take the floor, and yield four minutes, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER].

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, it has been said by some gentlemen, discussing this measure this morning, that this bill proposes to pledge the Government of the United States to the extent of at least $1,500,000 towards the success of this exposition. When the House took a vote on this some weeks ago, for the purpose of determining where the fair should be held, the bill then reported by the committee contained precisely the same provision and embraced the same amount of appropriation. If the vote of the House had indicated the great metropolitan city of New York as the proper place to hold the world's fair, I take it for granted that New York would not have declined the million and a half of dollars embraced in the original bill. If the choice had fallen upon St. Louis, it is fair to assume that she would have availed herself of the same appropriation, and had it come to the city of Washington, which was my own preference, because I thought, as the seat of the Government, it was the proper place, I presume Washington City would not have declined the money feature of the bill.

I should have preferred that the bill had some of the amendments which have been offered embodied in it; for instance, the amendment of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] I should have been glad to see incorporated in the bill. I am glad that the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] has been adopted. But, sir, when we recall the fact that the committee's bill as originally presented contained the appropriation of the same amount carried by this bill, and on a fair contest on the floor of the House for the site Chicago was selected as the proper place, and having been selected by a vote of the House, the subsequent bill of the committee, the one now under consideration, proposing to pledge the Government to the same extent, namely, one and a half millions of dollars precisely—the same as the original bill—I can not conceive that to be a reason for declining to accept the committee's present proposition. And what city, I ask, would have declined it? There was strong competition for it. It is not fair, therefore—it is not fair play, which is a jewel, and a jewel of the first water, to attack the bill now on the ground of the sum ap-appropriated, when we voted on the original bill containing the same appropriation.

Mr. COBB. I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi this question: whether he regards voting to fix the place as committing the House to the proposition.

Mr. HOOKER. Yes, I think it did; it certainly did to a certain extent. You voted to fix the place, and in the very bill fixing the place was embodied an appropriation of a million and a half of dollars for the Government exhibits, and the Government was pledged for that amount so far as the success of the exposition was concerned, whether the vote of the House decided in favor of one place or another. Now, as Chicago is fixed upon, I repeat that fair play requires that we should give to Chicago what we would have given had the site been chosen elsewhere; and, while it is not the place that I originally favored myself, it is the place where a great many people who live in the valley of the Mississippi favor, people who are linked together with bands of iron with Chicago, the great Illinois Central Railroad, as well as by the great streams which flow through that region bearing upon their bosoms the manufactures and the products of that whole region of country down to the golden bowl of the West Indies, the Gulf of Mexico; and many of my people prefer Chicago, and as she has been selected as the site I say that even-handed justice demands that we should do precisely in her case what we would have done or what many of us would have favored had New York been preferred or St. Louis or Washington.

If proper safeguards are thrown around the bill, as I believe they are, we should not interpose factious objections simply because it has gone to Chicago rather than another place. The bill does not propose to appropriate any more than the other bill, and I hope it will pass.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McADOO].

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that since the gentleman from Massachusetts inquired what time was remaining a few moments ago the Chair has examined and found that the gentleman was entitled to fifteen minutes instead of ten.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and myself, from the State of New Jersey, believe that we voiced the unanimous opinion of the people we represent when we voted for New York as the proper place for this exposition. But Chicago, after a splendid fight and a fair and a manly one on her part, secured the majority of the House in favor of that city as the selected site. The people of my State, who have never exhibited sectionalism on any question and who never will, who know no geographical distinction of North, South, East, or West among the people of this country, will heartily second the people of Chicago in making this fair a splendid success. [Applause.] Chicago is an American city, and the honor of all our people is bound up in showing to the world such an exposition as will even surpass that lately held in the Republic of France.

Now, as to the question of finances. The people of Chicago have induced the American Congress, on certain statements, to give them the world's fair. Chicago can not afford to make this fair anything but a grand success. She has everything at stake and all to lose. If she has obtained this fair upon false pretenses, upon fraudulent lists, upon bogus subscriptions, then it would have been better for Chicago that she had never secured the site; her temporary victory would then end in disastrous defeat. She has, therefore, more at stake than New York or any other portion of the country.

But, Mr. Speaker, I know that the people of Chicago will redeem their promises. They are bustling, active, manly, energetic, typical American people. They know what they have at stake, and I believe that this great Western metropolis will prove itself equal to the emergency, and that her public-spirited people will produce all the money necessary to make it a success. Honor, self-interest, and the future of their great city will be imperiled by anything short of unquestioned success.

While the debate was in progress as to the site or what city should be selected for that purpose, it was said somewhat facetiously, I must believe, that we of the East are complacently provincial in the sense in which an average Englishman is spoken of as insularly bigoted; and it was claimed that it would do foreigners good to have them land on our Eastern shores and go through this splendid country to see the progress and improvements which had been developed in the West. But it is not true that we are provincial. We are not provincial. We are beyond that. Why, my friend from the Trenton district [Mr. Buchanan] here has been all over the country. [Laughter.] If it were true at all it would do our Eastern people good to go up and rub against our Western brethren and catch the contagion of this tremendous enterprise, this muscular development, as it were, which has been developed so plentifully in that region, and whether true or not I, as a humble citizen of this country, will do my best to make the great fair at Chicago successful and one of which we all can be proud in all sections of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. SPINOLA. Mr. Speaker, a few minutes have been assigned me by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FLOWER], or what time I require. My first ten minutes expired before I had concluded what I desired to say. I shall first make this statement: I shall vote for the amendment which is before the House; nevertheless, if that amendment fail, I shall vote for the bill; but before doing so I shall be compelled, owing to the extreme modesty of my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], whom I respect as highly as any man can respect another—I shall ask whether this bill calls for an appropriation.

Mr. SPRINGER. Three hundred and twenty thousand dollars only.

Mr. SPINOLA. Then, if it calls for an appropriation, I shall ask that it take the same course that all bills calling for appropriations for public buildings during this session have taken; that is, that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. COLEMAN. With one exception, on your side of the House.

Mr. SPINOLA. What was that exception?

Mr. CUMMINGS. San José.

Mr. COLEMAN. The bill called up by Mr. CLUNIE, on your side.

Mr. SPINOLA. I shall be compelled to ask for that reference in deference to my friend from Illinois, who I know is too modest to call for it, as it calls for an appropriation; and, as it does, I think that it ought to go to the Committee on Appropriations. I ask that it may be referred to that committee under the general rule of the House; and if necessary I will make the point of order.

Mr. FLOWER. I ask—

Mr. WILSON, of Washington. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. SPINOLA. Undoubtedly; any man who had nine relatives in the Army can ask me a question. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON, of Washington. I understand that the gentleman said that he intended to vote for this bill?

Mr. SPINOLA. I certainly say I shall if that is the best thing we can do.

Mr. WILSON, of Washington. Then all you could state in your ten minutes was just for home consumption?

Mr. SPINOLA. That is, as looked at through your distorted, innocent vision. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELDEN. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that New York's delegation have not said a word against any appropriation. On the contrary, they have held themselves in abeyance, expecting that we would eventually have to make an appropriation from the United States Treasury, and we believe we will. We expect to vote for this bill, and we expect to vote to make the fair a success; but we have a right, and we propose to exercise it, as we have done, to show that Chicago has not fulfilled promises made, and express our belief that large appropriations will have to be made by the Government in order to secure the success that New York offered to secure and pay for. We do not come here with a sore thumb to show, and are not jealous or envious of Chicago's securing the fair. We do not want the fair, nor will we take it, but we expect to vote the Government's money because of our failure to make Chicago fulfill promises made while soliciting votes locating the fair. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. FLOWER. I have two minutes remaining, and, while I do not wish to seem to oppose Chicago in any way, yet there is a ludicrous side of this matter which is amusing to me. In the first place, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] the last time we had a bout here in regard to the fair made his farewell statement to this audience by saying that Chicago would certainly put up $10,000,000. He showed in his report, or in his minutes, a dispatch from three men saying Chicago had a subscription for $5,000,000 and they were sure of getting $5,000,000 more. In answer to my speech, in which I claimed that New York was the only city that could hold this fair in 1892, he said that Chicago could do so. So I suppose that inadvertently '93 has slipped into this bill. I do not object to it; I hope you will have a splendid fair; and I know you will. I have not voted against a single part of the bill, and I shall not vote against the million and a half, or the three millions that you will want to make this fair a success on the part of the Government exhibit. But he spoke of this subscription list. I know the parties that he spoke of well.

Mr. SPRINGER. Do you know Mr. Gage?

Mr. FLOWER. I know Mr. Gage.

Mr. SPRINGER. Do you believe he would state falsely what he would give?

Mr. FLOWER. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is not his statement in writing opposite his subscription?

Mr. FLOWER. I asked him to send a certified copy, as that would avoid all talk about it; but it has not come.

Mr. SPRINGER. You did not ask him to do it?

Mr. FLOWER. I did ask him to do it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Gage?

Mr. FLOWER. I did; and Mr. Young, too; the one and only time I saw them in the room of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. SPRINGER. I was not present?

Mr. FLOWER. You were not. The two men there talked about it with me and I told them just what I have said here. I said that the absence of this subscription list would cause talk at the other end of the Capitol, and told them to get a certified copy of it and file with our committee.

Mr. HATCH. I would just like to make one suggestion to the gentlemen from New York. My colleague on the committee has changed front on this matter so often that I would just like him now to desist and let him alone. [Laughter.]

Mr. FLOWER. If the gentleman from West Virginia will ask me to do so I will. [Laughter.] I will now yield the balance of my time to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, as I have spoken so many times and as it is not required of me to speak again, I will yield two minutes of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MANSUR].

Mr. FLOWER. I do not yield my time to the chairman of the committee so that he may yield to another.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. I will yield it out of the time I have remaining.

Mr. MANSUR. When the voice of the people of America decreed that there was to be a celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of this country and when Congress in obedience to that voice opened its doors for competitors, four trained athletes entered. It was but a little while until I, in common with many others, discovered that the great athlete of the Northwest, Chicago, stood alone against the other three; and while it is known that I stood by St. Louis and went down with her colors, as I did with many another, it was with pride and admiration at the strength of Chicago and of the great Northwest as developed in her victory. I felt that when she had thus won by common consent the location it was the duty of every member to aid in all reasonable ways to make her success the success of the nation. I believe that the people of that great city are enlisted in this matter. I believe that the development of the next three years will prove to the larger part of our country as well as to the whole world that the power and strength of the great American people lies west of the Alleghenies.

Chicago has a stake in the success of this exposition that will not let her fail. For her to fail now would be a tenfold disgrace on her part. Better tenfold for Chicago that she had never risen, Phoenix-like, from the great conflagration of 1873 than that she should trail the honor of the American nation, to be exemplified in this exhibition, in the dust. I know she will not do it. The energy and the spirit, the capital, the enterprise, and the pluck which characterize that great city of the West will make this exposition what it is predestined to-day to become, in my opinion, not only the grandest exhibition this country has ever seen, but the grandest the world has ever seen.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I trust that the members of the House who have not read the committee's report will read it, even after the vote is taken. They will find that the same fairness and justice which have been exercised throughout by this committee in the committee-room and in the House were extended to every member of the committee, and the facts upon which the report is based are therein set forth, and will be found, I think, so substantial that every man will indorse the wisdom of the committee and the fairness of the committee in accepting the statements of the gentlemen from Chicago.

I shall not explain the reference of the gentlemen from New York to the fact that they were not present at some of the meetings further than to say that they were invited to be present; but the gentleman who makes the complaint [Mr. BELDEN] was absent from the city, and another member of the committee, from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], was absent at Atlanta. And Mr. Bowden, of Virginia, a member of the committee, but not of the subcommittee, was present. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FLOWER] was invited to be present with the committee, and I think that in the earnestness of the debate—

Mr. FLOWER. When was I invited?

The CHAIRMAN. I invited you to be present at the meeting with the Chicago gentlemen and you declined.

Mr. FLOWER. Whereabouts?

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. When they were here.

Mr. FLOWER. You invited me to meet Mr. Gage when he came in on the train.

Mr. CANDLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I wish to claim for the committee that they investigated this matter with all the fairness which was possible for them to command, with the desire to give every one a fair hearing, both upon this floor and in the committee-room, and I say that the indorsements which they had from the city of Chicago ought to have satisfied the Representatives of this House and the Representatives of other cities, because the honor of the city of Chicago was at stake and is at stake, and the statements made to the committee deserved to be accepted as they were accepted. But what is more important they will find in the appendix the proposed plans and suggestions of the departments and bureaus of the United States Government that indicate the scope of the exposition, and I think will increase the interest of this House and the people and impress them with the high standard which it is expected to attain.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELDEN] desire to insist upon the motion to recommit?

Mr. BELDEN. I do.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BELDEN moved that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the World's Fair with instructions to report the same back with a favorable recommendation when a guaranty fund of $10,000,000 shall be secured by the citizens of Chicago, the sufficiency and legality of which shall be satisfactory to said committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLAND. Upon the passage of the bill I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 202, nays 48, not voting 79; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The following-named members were announced as paired on all political questions until further notice:

Mr. WADE with Mr. NORTON.

Mr. BLISS with Mr. CHIPMAN.
 Mr. SCRANTON with Mr. HEMPHILL.
 Mr. MUDD with Mr. RUSK.
 Mr. BROWER with Mr. BUNN.
 Mr. THOMPSON with Mr. TURNER, of Georgia.
 Mr. EVANS with Mr. PERRY.
 Mr. BROSIUS with Mr. REILLY.
 Mr. CALDWELL with Mr. MCCARTHY.
 Mr. WICKHAM with Mr. COTHRAN.
 Mr. KNAPP with Mr. STAHLNECKER.
 Mr. HOPKINS with Mr. BLOUNT.
 Mr. BREWER with Mr. COVERT.
 Mr. WILSON, of Kentucky, with Mr. PAYNTER.
 Mr. REYBURN with Mr. MCCLAMMY.
 Mr. LEHLBACH with Mr. OATES.
 Mr. FLOOD with Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina.
 Mr. FINLEY with Mr. CANDLER, of Georgia.
 Mr. SMITH, of Illinois, with Mr. SKINNER.
 Mr. WILBER with Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania.
 Mr. GIFFORD with Mr. TURPIN.
 Mr. STEPHENSON with Mr. GOODNIGHT.
 Mr. COWLES with Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan, until April 1.
 Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee, with Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana, until April 13.

For this day:

Mr. OWEN, of Indiana, with Mr. TUCKER.

Mr. CRAIG with Mr. BARNES.

Mr. WRIGHT with Mr. DARGAN.

For the rest of this day:

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR with Mr. ENLOE.

Mr. HARMER with Mr. MOORE, of Texas.

Mr. TURNER, of Kansas, with Mr. DUNPHY.

Mr. LANSING with Mr. WILEY.

Mr. WATSON with Mr. WASHINGTON, on this bill. If present, Mr. WATSON would vote for and Mr. WASHINGTON against it.

Mr. DARLINGTON with Mr. PENINGTON, on this bill. Mr. DARLINGTON would vote for it.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have my vote recorded.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in his seat and listening at the time his name was called?

Mr. BLISS. Having just returned to the city, I did not get into the Hall until a moment or two after my name was called. I ask unanimous consent that my vote may be recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not allowed under the rules to entertain the request.

Mr. BLISS. If permitted to vote, I should vote "ay."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can have the benefit of that statement in the RECORD.

Mr. ROGERS. During the first roll-call I was temporarily absent from the Hall and did not answer to my name, though I understand the Clerk, by mistake, recorded me as voting. On the second roll-call I was in my seat, but my name was not called. I desire to be recorded as voting "no."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's vote is so recorded.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I was announced as paired with my colleague, Mr. BLISS; but that pair applies only to political questions. On this question we both vote the same way.

Mr. OATES. I am paired on political questions with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH], but not on this bill. Therefore I have voted.

Mr. HOUK. My colleague, Mr. EVANS, is absent on account of sickness. If present, he would vote "ay."

Mr. BREWER. It has been announced from the Clerk's desk that I am paired with the gentleman from New York [Mr. COVERT]. We were paired until last evening upon all political questions. I presume that on this question the gentleman from New York would vote "ay," as I have voted. Therefore I allow my vote to stand.

Mr. MASON. I ask unanimous consent that the recapitulation of the names be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADMISSION OF WYOMING.

Mr. BAKER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill for the admission of Wyoming; and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent for the adoption of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Wednesday, March 26, immediately after the approval of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration in the House of the bill for the admission of Wyoming, and that unless previously ordered by the House the previous question shall be deemed ordered on the engrossment, third reading, and final passage of the bill at 4 o'clock p. m. of that day.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to this resolution.

Mr. BAKER. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill in relation to the admission of Wyoming.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House adjourn.

The question was put.

Several MEMBERS. The ayes seem to have it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in doubt. [Laughter.]

The House was counted; and there were—ayes 91, noes 94.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SPRINGER and Mr. BAKER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 96, noes 101.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 94, nays 113, not voting 122; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.
During the roll-call the following additional pairs were announced until further notice:

Mr. THOMAS M. BROWNE with Mr. BRIGGS.

On this vote:

Mr. WALLACE, of New York, with Mr. STONE, of Kentucky.

Mr. ROCKWELL with Mr. MCCREARY.

For the rest of the day:

Mr. DARLINGTON with Mr. PENINGTON.

Mr. CRAIG with Mr. WASHINGTON.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, with Mr. DAVIDSON.

Mr. WATSON with Mr. SHIVELY.

Mr. DORSEY. I move, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object.

Mr. HILL. I withdraw my vote, being paired with Mr. TUCKER on all political questions.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill for the admission of Wyoming.

The question was put to the House.

The SPEAKER. The yeas seem to have it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Division.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 87, noes 76.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SPRINGER and Mr. BAKER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 74, noes 45.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make the point of order that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BAKER. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The only point is that no quorum has voted.

Mr. BLAND. I make the point that there is no quorum present, as shown by the vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Illinois. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. That point the Chair will investigate.

The SPEAKER, having counted the House, announced the presence of 121 members, less than a quorum.

Mr. BAKER. I move a call of the House.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—yeas 78, noes 55.

So a call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Abbott,	Darlington,	Magner,	Skinner,
Allen, Miss.	Davidson,	Mason,	Smith, Ill.
Anderson, Miss.	De Haven,	McCarthy,	Smyser,
Bartine,	Dibble,	McClammy,	Spinola,

Dargan,

The SPEAKER. The roll-call discloses the presence of 167 members, being more than a quorum.

Mr. BAKER. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from New York that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill for the admission of the Territory of Wyoming; and the tellers will resume their places.

Mr. BAKER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 93, nays 64, not voting 172; as follows:

No quorum voting.

The following additional pairs were announced for the rest of the day:

Mr. BROWNE, of Virginia, with Mr. LEE.

Mr. COGSWELL with Mr. ANDREW.

Mr. HERMANN with Mr. LANHAM.

Mr. LODGE with Mr. CULBERTSON, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont, with Mr. KILGORE.

Mr. MASON with Mr. MCRAE.

The following were announced as being paired on this vote:

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi, with Mr. ROBERTSON.

Mr. CARUTH with Mr. BLANCHARD.

Mr. CARLTON with Mr. YODER.

On motion of Mr. BAKER, by unanimous consent, the recapitulation of the vote was dispensed with.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BAKER. I move that the House adjourn.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

Mr. KENNEDY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. 525) to establish two additional land offices in the State of Montana; when the Speaker signed the same.

And then the motion of Mr. BAKER was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE AND OTHER COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

TRANSFER OF PENSION BUREAU TO WAR DEPARTMENT.

Letter from the Secretary of War, replying to the resolution of the House of Representatives requesting that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior inform the House what saving of public expenditure, if any, can be made by transferring the Bureau of Pensions to the War Department—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN INDIAN AGENTS.

Letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs setting forth the claims of certain Indian agents for pay for a part of their terms of service, heretofore suspended by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department in the settlement of their accounts, together with a draught of a bill for their relief—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A bill (S. 73) for the relief of Avery D. Babcock and wife, of Oregon—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be read. Mr. SHERMAN. It is a substitute for the first section and is made to conform to the desires and requests of a committee that appeared before the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to substitute for section 1 of the amended bill:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of Agriculture may cause to be made a careful inspection of salted pork and bacon intended for exportation with a view to determining whether the same is wholesome, sound, and fit for human food whenever the laws, regulations, or orders of the government of any foreign country to which such pork or bacon is to be exported shall require inspection thereof relating to the importation thereof into such country; and also whenever any buyer, seller, or exporter of such meats intended for exportation shall request the inspection thereof.

Such inspection shall be made at the place where such meats are packed or boxed, and each package of such meats so inspected shall bear the marks, stamps, or other device for identification provided for in the last clause of this section: Provided, That an inspection of such meats may also be made at the place of exportation if an inspection has not been made at the place of packing, or if, in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, a reinspection becomes necessary. One copy of any certificate issued by any such inspector shall be filed in the Department of Agriculture; another copy shall be attached to the invoice of each separate shipment of such meat, and a third copy shall be delivered to the consignor or shipper of such meat as evidence that packages of salted pork and bacon have been inspected in accordance with the provisions of this act and found to be wholesome, sound, and fit for human food; and for the identification of the same such marks, stamps, or other devices as the Secretary of Agriculture may by regulation prescribe shall be affixed to each of such packages.

Any person who shall forge, counterfeit, or knowingly and wrongfully alter, deface, or destroy any of the marks, stamps, or other devices provided for in this section on any package of any such meats, or who shall forge, counterfeit, or knowingly and wrongfully alter, deface, or destroy any certificate in reference to meats provided for in this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. SHERMAN. This amendment is intended to meet the objections made by the packers and dealers in pork, and I believe covers substantially the objections they made. At least, so the committee intended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and placed upon the Calendar to accompany the bill.

PRINTING OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to ask for an order to print certain documents from the Department of State in relation to certain Mexican territory.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made if there be no objection. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ELLIS ISLAND, NEW YORK HARBOR.

Mr. McPHERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 46) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to remove the naval magazine from Ellis Island, in New York Harbor, and to purchase a site and erect a naval magazine at some other point, to report it with amendments. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 1, the committee report to fill the blank by inserting the words "seventy-five thousand;" so as to make the section read:

That the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be found necessary, be, and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to purchase, or to obtain by condemnation, a site for, and for the erection of, a naval magazine; and that the Secretary of the Navy shall select a site at a safe distance from populous cities and from the shipping of the harbor of New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee also report an amendment to strike out the preamble, which will be considered at a later stage.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to add to section 2 the following:

And the further sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to improve said Ellis Island for immigration purposes.

Mr. McPHERSON. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to remove the naval magazine from Ellis Island, in New York Harbor, and to purchase a site and erect a naval magazine at some other point, and for other purposes."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Committee on Naval Affairs report as an amendment to strike out the preamble.

The amendment was agreed to.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I offer a resolution as a matter of privilege, and ask for its present consideration if there is no objection.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Ordered, That on and after Monday next, March 31, the daily sessions of the Senate shall commence at 11 o'clock a. m. until otherwise ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MORGAN. Let it go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution will lie over.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill (S. 3271) to enable the Secretary of the Interior to carry out in part the provisions of "An act to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians in Dakota into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1889, and making appropriations for the same, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3272) for removal of charge of desertion from Alfred Lane; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MOODY introduced a bill (S. 3273) for the relief of Frank M. Allen; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3274) for the relief of James Ballard; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3275) for the relief of John William Cable; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3276) for the relief of Thomas W. Thompson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Select Committee on Indian Depredations.

Mr. CHANDLER introduced a bill (S. 3277) to define the route of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3278) to amend section 416 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to the establishment of the Department of the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPRINT OF SUNDAY-REST BILL.

On motion of Mr. BLAIR, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. 946) to secure to the people the privileges of rest and of religious worship free from disturbance by others on the first day of the week be reprinted for the use of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the concurrent resolution of the Senate for the printing of the annual report of the health officer of the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 8393) to provide for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus by holding an international exhibition of arts, industries, manufactures, and the products of the soil, mine, and sea in the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 525) to establish two additional land offices in the State of Montana; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

TRUSTS AND COMBINATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business? If not, the Calendar will be taken up.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 1) to declare unlawful trusts and combinations in restraint of trade and production.

The motion was agreed to.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

Mr. HARRIS. Before proceeding with the unfinished business, I should be glad, if it suits the convenience of the Senator from New Hampshire, that we could fix some hour of such day as may be convenient to him to dispose of his motion to reconsider the vote by which the educational bill failed of a third reading. Would it suit the convenience of the Senator to name a day?

Mr. BLAIR. I am not now able to indicate a time to the Senator, but I shall conveniently call up that motion.

Mr. HARRIS. I think the Senate ought to know in advance the time at which it will come up.

Mr. BLAIR. I will say to the Senator that it will not be called up without ample notice to the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. I call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the fact that the pending question is on the motion that I made to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. HARRIS. So I understand.

Mr. INGALLS. Therefore, I suppose that properly speaking the interrogatory should be addressed to me and I should be inquired of when it would suit my convenience to call up the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. HARRIS. It affords me a great deal of pleasure, then, to ask the Senator from Kansas what hour of what early day will suit his convenience.

Mr. INGALLS. I should be very glad to have the motion taken up now.

Mr. HARRIS. I should be very glad to have it taken up now or at the earliest day possible.

TRUSTS AND COMBINATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1) to declare unlawful trusts and combinations in restraint of trade and production.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are one or two verbal amendments that I should like to have made. They are made necessary by the amendments agreed to yesterday. In line 4 of the first section of the reprinted bill I move to strike out the word "citizens" and insert the word "persons."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. In line 15 of the first section I move to strike out the word "citizens" and insert the word "persons."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is an amendment prepared by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] to come in on line 26. If he is ready to offer it now, I should be very glad to have it presented.

Mr. SPOONER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to come in after the word "execution" in line 26 of section 1.

Mr. INGALLS. Is that an amendment of substance?

Mr. SPOONER. I think it is.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator will allow me a few moments, I wish to offer certain amendments which are rendered necessary by the change in the enumeration of the sections. On page 5 of the reprinted bill, in line 7 of section 6, I move to strike out the word "three" and insert the word "eight;" so as to read:

In section 8 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. In section 7, line 4, I move to strike out the word "three" and insert the word "eight;" so as to read:

In section 8 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. In section 9, line 9, I move to strike out the word "three" and insert the word "eight;" so as to read:

In section 8 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. In section 9, line 12, I move to strike out the word "one" and insert the word "six;" so as to read:

As defined by section 6 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. In section 9, line 14, I move to strike out the word "two" and insert the word "seven;" so as to read:

As defined in section 7 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. In section 13, line 19, I move to strike out the word "three" and to insert the word "eight;" so as to read:

Any of the other articles mentioned in section 8 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. In section 14, line 8, I move to strike out the word "four," after "section," and insert the word "nine;" so as to read:

Being liable for the amounts prescribed in section 9 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. In section 14, line 12, after the word "section," I move to strike out the word "eight" and insert the word "thirteen;" so as to read:

A false or fraudulent return or report required by section 13 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to have two verbal amendments made. In section 3, line 3, I move to change the word "employed" to the word "engaged." I think that is a more appropriate word.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, line 3, it is proposed to strike out the word "employed" and to insert the word "engaged;" so as to read: Manager of any trust engaged in any business carried on with any foreign country.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. In section 3, line 7, I move to strike out the word "employed" and to insert the word "engaged;" so as to read:

Corporation, company, or person engaged in any such business, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. Does that conclude the amendments?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; there is another amendment to be offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is an amendment, and there is also an amendment to an amendment pending now. Yesterday the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] offered an amendment, to which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] proposed an amendment. The amendment and the amendment to the amendment will be read.

Mr. HOAR. I will withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada is withdrawn.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending amendment, offered by the Senator from Nevada, will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, section 1, line 17, of the reprinted bill, after the word "articles," insert the words "or of the value of money by which such cost may be advanced or reduced;" so as to read:

And all arrangements, trusts, or combinations between such persons or corporations made with a view or which tend to advance the cost to the consumer of any such articles, or of the value of money by which such cost may be advanced or reduced, are hereby declared to be against public policy, unlawful, and void.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now the Senator from Wisconsin can offer his amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. I offer now the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in after the word "execution," in the twenty-sixth line of section one of the reprint.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section one, line 26, of the reprinted bill, after the word "execution," insert:

And whenever in any action commenced under the provisions of this act in the name of the United States any arrangement, trust, or combination herein declared void is found by any such court to exist, the court may, in addition to other remedies, issue its writ of injunction, temporary or final, running and to be served anywhere within the jurisdiction of the United States, prohibiting and restraining the defendants or any thereof, or their or any of their servants, agents, or attorneys, from proceeding further in the business of said arrangement, trust, or combination, except to wind up its affairs; and in case of any disobedience of any such writ of injunction or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise, issued in any such cause, it shall be lawful for said court to issue writs of attachment, running and to be served anywhere within the United States, against the defendants or any thereof, and against their or any of their agents, attorneys, or servants, of whatever name or office, disobeying said injunction or other process; and the court may, if it shall think fit, in addition to fine or imprisonment for contempt, make an order directing any such defendants disobeying such writ of injunction or other process to pay such sum of money, not exceeding $1,000, for every day after a date to be named in such order that such defendant or defendants or their or any of their agents, attorneys, or servants as aforesaid shall refuse or neglect to obey such injunction or other process; and such money shall be paid into court, and may be paid in whole or in part to the party or parties upon whose complaint said action was instituted, or into the Treasury of the United States, as the court shall direct. And in any action brought by the United States under the provisions of this act the Attorney-General may bring the action in any district in which any one of the parties defendant resides or transacts business, and any other parties, corporate or otherwise, may, regardless of residence or location of business, be brought into court in said action, in the manner provided by section 738 of the Revised Statutes, and the court shall thereupon have jurisdiction of the defendant or defendants so brought in, as fully to all intents and purposes as if they had appeared in said action.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I offer this amendment to cure what seems to me to be a very great defect in the bill. Most if not all of the combinations, however they may be called, aimed at by the bill, are detrimental to the public interest. I think of them all it will be agreed that two of them, whose ramifications extend throughout the whole country and who directly affect the people generally in the country, the sugar trust and what is called the beef combine, are infamous in their oppression, the sugar trust dealing with an article which goes into the daily consumption of the people, which goes into every house, to every family. I believe 52 pounds per year per capita are used by the people of the United States. The object of this trust is to keep up to consumers the price of sugar. The beef combine, with which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has been endeavoring to deal, has been so successful as to maintain at the war rate the price of beef to consumers throughout the United States, and to depress it among those, the farmers and others, who raise cattle, so as to render that industry no longer a profitable one.

The sugar trust is made up, as I understand it, of seventeen different corporations, some of them citizens of different States. Manifestly to deal efficiently with a trust or combination of that character it must be possible to bring into one action, into one court, the essential parties defendant. One of the arguments made by the Senator from Ohio in favor of this bill was that there might be under its provisions such a concentration of defendants; but as the law stands to-day there could be none, and I desire to call the attention of the Senate for a moment to the sections of the Revised Statutes bearing upon the subject. Section 737 provides:

SEC. 737. When there are several defendants in any suit at law or in equity, and one or more of them are neither inhabitants of nor found within the district in which the suit is brought, and do not voluntarily appear, the court may entertain jurisdiction, and proceed to the trial and adjudication of the suit between the parties who are properly before it; but the judgment or decree rendered therein shall not conclude or prejudice other parties not regularly served with process nor voluntarily appearing to answer; and non-joiner of parties who are not inhabitants of nor found within the district, as aforesaid, shall not constitute matter of abatement or objection to the suit.

Whoever may be parties defendant in the action, under that section the court might proceed as to those within the jurisdiction; but its judgment could have no effect whatever upon those not served or not voluntarily appearing.

Section 738 provides:

SEC. 738. When any defendant in a suit in equity to enforce any legal or equitable lien or claim against real or personal property within the district where the suit is brought—

And it was amended so as to include suits brought to remove a cloud upon title to land in a district—is not an inhabitant of nor found within the said district, and does not voluntarily appear thereto, it shall be lawful for the court to make an order directing such absent defendant to appear, plead, answer, or demur to the complainant's bill at a certain day, therein to be designated.

Then follows a provision for obtaining jurisdiction in a mode to be pointed out by the order of publication or otherwise:

But the said adjudication shall, as regards such absent defendant without appearance, affect his property within such district only.

Then comes this section, to which I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio:

SEC. 739. Except in the cases provided in the next three sections, no person shall be arrested in one district for trial in another, in any civil action before a circuit or district court; and except in the said cases and the cases provided by the preceding section, no civil suit shall be brought before either of said courts against an inhabitant of the United States, by any original process, in any other district than that of which he is an inhabitant or in which he is found at the time of serving the writ.

One object of the amendment is to provide that the court may bring in these parties wherever they reside or wherever they are doing business and have as full and complete jurisdiction over them upon publication as if they voluntarily appeared in the action. This provision I regard as absolutely essential to the efficiency of the bill.

Another matter which is covered by the amendment is this. For myself, I think the efficacious remedy will be found to be, not the crimfinal prosecution provided for by the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], but the vigorous and drastic use of the writ of injunction. Under the law as it stands to-day that writ can only be served and punishment for its disobedience enforced within the district over which the court has jurisdiction. By the amendment which I have sent to the desk, this writ of injunction may be served anywhere within the United States, and if it is disobeyed the attachment for contempt may be served anywhere within the United States. I think the amendment ought to be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HOAR. I ask that it be read once more.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. SPOONER.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I did not have the pleasure of hearing the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin, explanatory, I suppose, of this amendment, owing to the confusion in the Chamber; but so far as I can understand the amendment proposed by him as just read at the desk, it is that when jurisdiction once is obtained by a court there shall be attached also those additional remedies, a general power to issue remedial process by injunction and otherwise, which are recited in the amendment of the Senator, process and remedies which I agree with him in thinking would be exceedingly important to effect any proper object under this bill. But I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin, who has no doubt studied carefully the provisions to which he has offered the amendment, as to the clause he seeks to amend, commencing at line 18 of the first section of the bill and reading as follows:

And the circuit court of the United States shall have original jurisdiction of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity arising under this section, and to issue all remedial process, orders, or writs proper and necessary to enforce its provisions. And the Attorney-General and the several district attorneys are hereby directed, in the name of the United States, to commence and prosecute all such cases to final judgment and execution.

I should like to ask him how under that language, taken in connection with what precedes it in the prior part of the first section, the court is in the first place to obtain any jurisdiction of any matter or thing or parties with reference to the subject of this first section. The Senator will remember the previous part of the first section declares:

That all arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between two or more citizens or corporations, or both, made with a view or which tend to prevent full and free competition in the importation, transportation, or sale of articles imported into the United States.

And so on; I do not read further. These arrangements, etc., are declared to be against public policy, unlawful, and void; and then the section goes on to declare in the language that I have just read that the circuit courts of the United States shall have original jurisdiction of all suits of a civil nature at common law and in equity. I ask the Senator how that jurisdiction is to be invoked? What is to be the lis mota in any circuit court of the United States whereby the provisions of this first section shall be brought into activity? I grant you that when jurisdiction has attached the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin would be exceedingly important in rendering thorough and effectual that jurisdiction; but I do not understand how or under what circumstances the circuit court of the United States is to obtain the jurisdiction spoken of in the language which the Senator seeks to amend.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, the observations submitted by the Senator from Delaware are aimed really not at the amendment which I have offered, as it seems to me—

Mr. GRAY. Not at all. I was asking for information.

Mr. SPOONER. But at the bill. I have some doubts about the efficacy of the section. I should have been glad, for I want the best bill that can be drawn, if this bill had been in the first instance—and I say that with all due respect to the Senator from Ohio and the Committee on Finance—referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, in order that it might receive from that committee careful examination and study. I think it will be agreed that no subject has been brought before the Senate involving questions of law of a more complicated character and more difficult of solution than the propositions involved in this bill.

The Senate saw fit yesterday to reject the proposition to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, and in view of the protest made by the Senator from Ohio on behalf of the Committee on Finance I voted against the reference. I am assuming that the bill will be a constitutional enactment and that it will give to the circuit courts of the United States jurisdiction at the suit of the United States to dissolve, suppress, and enjoin these combinations which are declared by this bill to be void, as against public policy.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me to interrupt him with a question at this point—

Mr. SPOONER. Always.

Mr. GRAY. The remarks that I made in regard to the amendment and the clause that was sought to be amended were not directed to any question of the constitutionality of the bill, but were merely an inquiry as to how under the mechanism of this first section the court was to obtain in the first instance the jurisdiction which the Senator from Wisconsin seeks to enlarge by his amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. The bill attempts to give it; but that is not a question which I care to discuss at any length now.

Mr. PUGH. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. PUGH. Would not the court under the general jurisdiction already conferred by the bill have the power to issue any remedial process?

Mr. SPOONER. Of course, in any case in which the court would have jurisdiction, the suit being in equity, the court would have the power to issue remedial writs within its territorial jurisdiction.

Mr. PUGH. Then what is the necessity for the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SPOONER. I will explain again to the Senator from Alabama. How far this bill will give jurisdiction in any case in which the United States courts are not now possessed of it, I do not undertake now to say.

The bill declares certain trusts, combinations, and agreements void. It gives the circuit courts of the United States original jurisdiction of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity arising under this section. That would include, of course, controversies between citizens of different States.

Mr. GRAY. That is just the point if the Senator will allow me: How shall a suit at common law or in equity, arising under this section, be brought?

Mr. SPOONER. It is not my province to attempt now to satisfy the Senator on that question, for I am only discussing my amendment. I am only, on the assumption that there is something of substance in this bill, endeavoring to incorporate in it a provision without which, to my mind, it will be in any event utterly without strength or efficiency.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator a question if he has got through his answer to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question in reference to his amendment. I understand that the amendment assumes that somehow or other the court has obtained jurisdiction, and that it has found that somewhere in the United States this offense or injury has been committed. Then it issues an injunction. The court may be held in Maine and the party against whom the injunction is to issue, or the transaction which it strikes at, the business which it strikes at, may have been carried on or performed in California in whole or in part. Now, the amendment of the Senator, as I heard it read and as I read it, provides that the court shall have jurisdiction and shall have power to punish by fine and imprisonment for contempt for the disobedience of its orders. For the purposes of my question we may concede legality, constitutionality, and the wisdom of the section up to that point, without going into any such question. Now, the Senator, in addition to that, if I understand his amendment, says that the court shall have power to order a penalty for the carrying on of the business of $1,000 a day.

Now, that is a clear penalty and nothing but a penalty for an offense. It is a part of the civil remedy of the individual who suffers; it is not the sum which is to be recovered by the United States if it has suffered in any of its properties or functions which would make it a suitor for it to assert its own rights, but it is a clear, sheer penalty. The contempt of court has been satisfied previously by the assumption of the amendment. The injury to the United States or to anybody else in the way of property or business or any other material necessity is satisfied in another way. Then is this anything more than asserting the principle that you may enforce the penal or criminal laws of the United States by getting an injunction against a man in advance against offending against those criminal or penal laws and having judgment without a jury and punish him by a fine of $1,000 for every day? You are not trying that offense; or rather I put that question to the Senate at this point. You are not trying that offense in the vicinity where it happened, in the district where it was committed previously ascertained by law. You are not trying it by a jury; you are not trying it in the presence of the party accused, where he has met the witnesses against him face to face. Now, is it the constitutional right of the law-making power to say that, in addition to all civil remedies, including the remedy for contempt of court, you may suppress offenses against public order by getting an injunction in advance against permitting the act, and then having so acted the judge in his discretion may fine the party?

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, the bill as it now stands, if I may continue what I was saying, declares that certain trusts, combinations, and agreements are void. I repeat it gives to the circuit courts—jurisdiction of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity arising under this section, and to issue all remedial process, orders, or writs proper and necessary to enforce its provisions. And the Attorney-General and the several district attorneys are hereby directed, in the name of the United States, to commence and prosecute all such cases to final judgment and execution.

The amendment which I have sent to the desk does not apply to any suit which is a controversy between citizens of different States to recover damages because of such unlawful arrangement. It is limited in its operation to suits commenced by the Attorney-General and the several district attorneys in the name of the United States, and to be prosecuted to final judgment, to suppress, dissolve, and destroy the combinations found to exist detrimental to the public interests and declared void by this act.

As I said in explaining this amendment at the outset, all of these trusts, or nearly all of them, are made up of different firms, of corporations, and of citizens of different States. The Senator from Ohio argued that in the suits brought by the United States under the provisions of this act all of the parties to the trust might be made defendants, and the court having acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the defendants could deal with them. I brought to the attention of the Senate the fact that that assumption by the Senator from Ohio is a mistaken one as the law now stands, and that the statutory rule is that no man shall, with a single exception or so, be sued in the United States courts except in the district where he happens to reside or where he happens to be found. So, then, in prosecuting the sugar trust under the provisions of this act, made up of seventeen distinct corporations, as I understand it, only one of which, if you please, is a citizen of the State of New York, there would be no power to obtain jurisdiction in a single suit except over one. Seventeen different suits would be necessary, possibly. That, it seemed to me, was a weakness in this bill which ought to be remedied.

It seems to me that in dealing with it we ought to deal with it, although a civil suit brought in the name of the United States, just as we would deal with it if it were a criminal case involving as defendants half a dozen citizens of different States, because the combination aimed at is criminal, is a crime against the people, and it requires strong measures to afford any remedy for it.

To remedy this defect I provide in the pending amendment that the action may be brought in any district where any one of the defendants resides or is doing business, and that if there be other defendants, other members of the combine or trust, located in other districts in the same State or in other States, they may be brought into court and made defendants in that action, in order that the parties to the trust may be consolidated and dealt with at the suit of the United States by one of its courts in one case, under the provisions of section 738 of the Revised Statutes, with which I suppose every Senator is familiar. That is a section which provides—

SEC. 738. When any defendant in a suit in equity to enforce any legal or equitable lien or claim against real or personal property within the district where the suit is brought—is not an inhabitant of nor found within the said district, and does not voluntarily appear thereto, it shall be lawful for the court to make an order directing such absent defendant to appear, plead, answer, or demur to the complainant's bill at a certain day, therein to be designated; and the said order shall be served on such absent defendant, if practicable, wherever found, or, where such personal service is not practicable, shall be published in such manner as the court shall direct. If such absent defendant does not appear, plead, answer, or demur within the time so limited or within some further time to be allowed by the court in its discretion, it shall be lawful for the court, upon proof of the service or publication of the said order, and of the performance of the directions contained therein, to entertain jurisdiction and proceed to the hearing and adjudication of such suit, in the same manner as if such absent defendant had been served with process within the said district. But the said adjudication shall, as regards such absent defendant without appearance, affect his property within such district only.

There has been since added to it, as I stated, a suit brought in equity to remove a cloud from title—

The next section I again read, as some Senators who now are present did not hear it read before:

SEC. 739. Except in the cases provided in the next three sections, no person shall be arrested in one district for trial in another, in any civil action before a circuit or district court; and, except in the said cases and the cases provided by the preceding section, no civil suit shall be brought before either of said courts against an inhabitant of the United States, by any original process, in any other district than that of which he is an inhabitant or in which he is found at the time of serving the writ.

Now, the object of one branch of the amendment is to enable the United States court, when the suit is brought in the name of the United States to suppress one of these combinations or trusts made up of citizens or corporations of different States, to bring them all into that suit, wherever they may happen to reside. I have no doubt it is within the constitutional power of Congress to do this, because I think the entire power to regulate the procedure is under the Constitution in Congress.

So much for that. I stated, although I did not get the attention of some, that I thought the only efficient remedy in this bill, if it shall become a law, is not in the penal clause introduced by the amendment of the Senator from Texas, but is in the merit of injunction.

As the law stands to-day that writ can not be made effective except where it is served within the jurisdiction of the court; it can have no effect whatever beyond the jurisdiction of the court; and so I have provided (which I think is also clearly within the constitutional power of Congress) that in addition to other remedial process the court shall have the power to issue its writ of injunction running anywhere and to be served anywhere within the United States. I would not agree to that in any ordinary case; I would not agree to it in controversies between citizens of different States; but it has seemed to me, as it was necessary to make this an efficient bill in view of the fact that we were dealing with a set of combinations of great power whose oppressions are criminal, that we ought to make these writs of injunction run throughout the country and to be served anywhere.

Now, Mr. President, I come to the suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. The amendment provides—and of course the proposition to make the writ of injunction servable anywhere must carry with it, to make it forceful, the proposition to make the writ of attachment run anywhere—that the writ of attachment also for disobedience to the writ of injunction, it having been so served, may go anywhere within the United States. And it provides—I am not particular about this provision—that the court may, in addition to the imprisonment for contempt, direct the payment of a thousand dollars a day for every day after a date to be fixed in the order that the defendants or any one of the defendants shall neglect or refuse to obey the injunction.

I took that from the interstate-commerce law. I had doubt when that bill was under discussion, and the same doubt, I think, which the Senator from Massachusetts indicates now, not perhaps as to the legality of the provision, but as to its expediency. I never was absolutely certain that it was valid. It was drawn, I think, by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. It provides, after giving power to restrain common carriers from continuing such violation or disobedience—to restrain such common carrier from further continuing such violation or disobedience of such order or requirement of said commission, and enjoining obedience to the same; and in case of any disobedience of any such writ of injunction or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise, it shall be lawful for such court to issue writs of attachment, or any other process of said court incident or applicable to writs of injunction or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise, against such common carrier, and, if a corporation, against one or more of the directors, officers, or agents of the same, or against any owner, lessee, trustee, receiver, or other person failing to obey such writ of injunction or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise; and said court may, if it shall think fit, make an order directing such common carrier or other person so disobeying such writ of injunction or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise, to pay such sum of money not exceeding for each carrier or person in default the sum of $500 for every day after a day to be named in the order that such carrier or other person shall fail to obey such injunction or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise; and such moneys shall be payable as the court shall direct, either to the party complaining, or into court to abide the ultimate decision of the court, or into the Treasury; and payment thereof may, without prejudice, etc.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. My attention was not called to that when that law passed as a particular item of the bill; but without going into any discussion as to whether that is valid or not, my question to the Senator was whether it would be valid, in his judgment, having fully exhausted the punishment by fine for contempt, then to make an additional penalty which should be in the nature of the case only something in the nature of a penalty, not for contempt, but for the offense against public order. If that be true, if that be the difference between that and the Senator's amendment, is it within the constitutional power of Congress, in authorizing the courts to punish for contempt, to provide that any offense against the law shall be reached by a judge imposing a fine, by way of penalty, trying him in a different district from the one in which he lives? In other words, what is the thousand dollars' fine for which the Senator provides? It is not a fine for contempt. You have got that in addition. Is it anything else than a penal punishment?

Mr. SPOONER. I think it can not fairly be regarded otherwise than an additional penalty. I am not strenuous about that feature of the amendment at all. It might be so amended as to make it in the disjunctive, so that the court might punish by fine or imprisonment, or by requiring payment of a sum of money for each day's disobedience.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator can remove my objection, which is a very narrow one in one sense, but at the same time it is a constitutional one.

Mr. SPOONER. I think there is force in the objection.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that the Senator say "in addition to fine or imprisonment for contempt make an order punishing for contempt."

Mr. SPOONER. I am quite willing to accept that amendment. It seemed to me that there ought to be something more than an ordinary fine for contempt. These corporations and trusts, which make tremendous profits, can very well afford to pay such a fine; but I think that in such cases, just as in the operation of the interstate-commerce law, it would have an excellent deterrent effect if every day's indulgence in the luxury of disobeying the injunction of the court is made to be a costly one. I am quite willing to accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to ask the Senator what is the amendment he accepts?

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin where he says "in addition to the fine or imprisonment for contempt" to say "in addition to other lawful punishment for contempt make an order" directing so and so.

Mr. SPOONER. I accept the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Let the amendment be read from the desk so that it may be understood by the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 8 of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], on the second page, after the word "to," it is proposed to strike out the words "fine or imprisonment" and insert the words "lawful punishment;" so as to read:

And the court may, if it shall think fit, in addition to other lawful punishment for contempt, make an order directing any such defendant disobeying such order of injunction, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin as amended.

Mr. GRAY. Before the amendment is adopted, I want to ask the Senator from Wisconsin another question, because, if there is to be a jurisdiction provided for in the courts that is to be effectual, it might as well be in the line indicated by the Senator.

The jurisdiction given in the first section, in the clause which the Senator from Wisconsin seeks to amend, is in "all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity." That embraces the whole judicial power of the United States. Now, in all suits at common law, Article VII of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States provides:

In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law.

I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if his amendment goes to the extent of providing by way of execution of a judgment at common law that the court may issue this writ of injunction for which he provides.

Mr. SPOONER. My intention was that in any action in which it would be appropriate to issue the writ of injunction it might be issued.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator will allow me, I will make my question a little broader. He knows very well that the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that in the conferring of jurisdiction by the Constitution of suits at common law and in equity where equity jurisdiction is obtained it must be according to the interpretation of that word in the law of England at the time of the adoption of the Constitution; that is, it must be the general equitable or chancery jurisdiction as known then by lawyers to exist in English jurisprudence, and in suits in equity in which juries are not required the process by injunction is appropriate and ancillary to the main process, and I know no reason why it should not be to the minor process; that is, the amendment would be appropriate. But does the Senator from Wisconsin undertake by his amendment to make the remedy by injunction as by way of execution appropriate to a common-law suit?

Mr. SPOONER. I did not intend to change the cases in which the writ of injunction is within the jurisdiction of the Federal court as a proper writ. I think the Federal courts sometimes in actions at law issue a writ of injunction. It is in those cases where the proceedings in the cause conform to the laws of the State in actions at law, and in many of the States it is provided as one of the remedies that the writ of injunction may issue. In an action of ejectment sometimes a writ of injunction is issued pending the determination of the cause. I did not intend by the amendment to work any revolution in the law on that subject as it now stands.

Mr. GRAY. Of course the Senator from Wisconsin did not intend to work any revolution, but in order that his amendment might accomplish what he really intends I wanted to bring his attention to the point I have suggested.

Mr. SPOONER. It was intended to have reference to what preceded: And the circuit court of the United States shall have original jurisdiction of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity arising under this section, and to issue all remedial process, orders, or writs proper and necessary to enforce its provisions.

I thought that left it where it is now, and my amendment was intended to have reference to that general language which preceded it; and I think, taking the section together, there can be no doubt as to that construction. In other words, I have not intended by the amendment, nor will it have that effect, to impart to or to ingraft upon an ordinary action at law commenced in a Federal court the remedy by injunction where, under the general jurisdiction of the country, it does not now exist.

Mr. GRAY. Inasmuch as the remedy by injunction and the power to issue injunction is a peculiar feature and power of an equitable court exercising equitable jurisdiction, I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that it might be well to confine the scope of his amendment to a suit so arising.

Mr. SPOONER. I have no objection to that, although I think it quite plain, taking the section as it will read, that the writ of injunction would under this amendment be only authorized to issue where under the law now it would be authorized to issue. This bill does confer upon the court the right in any action to issue a writ which it would not be at liberty in an action of the same nature to issue now, as I understand it, and the amendment, I think, would have no larger scope or effect.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, the original bill has been very much improved, and one of the great objections has been removed from it by the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], which relieves the class of persons who would have been the first prosecuted under the original bill without the amendment. I am very much gratified that the Senator offered the amendment, and that the Senate adopted it, which reads as follows:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to apply to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations between laborers made with the view of lessening the number of hours of their labor or of increasing their wages; nor to any arrangements, agreements, associations, or combinations among persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture, made with a view of enhancing the price of their own agricultural or horticultural products.

Those were the points to which I called the attention of the Senate yesterday. I am glad that much is granted, and I am glad of other additions which have been made. The bill ought now in some respects to be satisfactory to every person who is opposed to the oppression of labor and desires to see it properly rewarded.

I beg leave of the Senate, however, to call attention to the way, if this should become a law, in which everybody might be put in the penitentiary who attempted to carry on any kind of business, provided the bill becomes a law and can be enforced. The third section of the bill as amended provides that certain things which are enumerated in that section shall be high crimes and misdemeanors and punished by a fine—not exceeding $10,000 or imprisonment at hard labor in the penitentiary not exceeding five years, or by both of said penalties, in the discretion of the court trying the same.

It then, in order to warn people so that they may not fall into the penitentiary inadvertently, defines what a trust is. The fourth section commences with the definition of a trust, as follows:

That a trust is a combination of capital, skill, or acts by two or more persons, firms, corporations, or associations of persons, or of any two or more of them, for either, any, or all of the following purposes:

First. To create or carry out any restrictions in trade.

Well, just what would be a restriction in trade it would be difficult to define, but we will not comment upon that particular provision now. It is vague, and a man might be liable under it without knowing exactly what he had done. The second provision reads:

Second. To limit or reduce the production or to increase or reduce the price of merchandise or commodities.

That would make pretty nearly everybody criminal. It says "to limit or reduce the production." That would apply to a case where, if in one line of industry there was overproduction and the volume of money was being rapidly contracted and those engaged in that industry were on the eve of bankruptcy and they should attempt to make an agreement to limit their production until they could bridge over the particular difficulties, they would all have to go to the penitentiary. The alternative would be the penitentiary or bankruptcy.

Then, "to increase or reduce the price of merchandise or commodities." If a person should make an invention which would have a tendency to reduce the price of any article he would, if he formed a combination to carry that invention into execution—if two or more persons united to push that invention (and that is the usual means by which inventions have been brought into use), all who united themselves together would certainly be engaged in an effort to reduce the price of a commodity or of the merchandise which the improved method would produce. So the inventors would all pretty much have to go to the penitentiary, because all useful inventions have a tendency to reduce the price of articles to the consumer; and if two or more of them unite together they are criminals. That, I think, would put a very great damper upon all enterprise if it were carried out according to the terms of this bill.

The third clause of the same section reads:

Third. To prevent competition in the manufacture, making, purchase, sale, or transportation of merchandise, produce, or commodities.

I suppose that trade-marks are a legitimate thing, and we have many laws on our statute-book protecting trade-marks so that one man shall not have the advantage of another in the use of his credit or standing as a business man or as an inventor. I thought a trade-mark was a right which parties could be protected in, so that they might have their goods distinguished from other people's goods. I know most of the States have criminal laws to protect trade-marks, so that each individual may have the benefit of his own enterprise and industry in the conduct of his business.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the Senator from Nevada allow me to make an explanation? I think his reasoning upon the subject is utterly wrong. The Senator will see that what gives the court jurisdiction is the third section. That fixes what is the offense. The fourth section simply enumerates certain things which being done are made, in pursuance of the first section, unlawful. If the Senator supposes that the paragraphs to which he refers are meant to give power to Congress to regulate and do these things independent of the first section, he will see that is not my purpose, for it would be confessedly what Congress can not do. But I will put it so that he will understand it by a transposition of the sentence:

"That all persons engaged in the creation of any trust, or as owner or part owner, agent, or manager of any trust engaged in any business carried on, first, with a foreign country; second, between the States; third, or between any State and the District of Columbia; fourth, or between any State or any Territory of the United States."

That is, as between foreign countries and States and Territories, using its powers for either of the purposes specified in the fourth section of this act. That is what the provision is. Now, look at the first paragraph: "Using its powers to create or carry out any restrictions in trade." That is, in dealing with the commerce between this country and others, or between the States and Territories, or the States and the District of Columbia; those who create restrictions in trade become subject to the penal clause. Then that clause operates. You have to read each one of these separate paragraphs, not that Congress may undertake to do these things independently of the first section, but it is one of the definitions of the class of things that would come within the province and purview of the first section.

Mr. STEWART. I think I comprehend it. The business made unlawful, as I understand it, is business that is carried on with any foreign country, or between any of the States, or between a State and a Territory, or between a State and the District of Columbia. Any business of that kind that extends throughout the States is the business referred to. The trust defined in the fourth section is to be composed of "two or more persons, firms, corporations, or associations of persons." Any two or more persons engaged in the business of manufacturing any article vended in different States or in any foreign country who attempt to have an exclusive trade mark would have to go to the penitentiary, as I understand the bill.

We ought to know who is to go to the penitentiary, and whether a man would be liable to go to the penitentiary if he confines the products of his manufactures to his own State. I admit this bill would not apply if he did not send his goods out of the State; and some of the Eastern States are so small that they would have a very small custom if they were compelled to keep their goods within their own State. When the goods are sent into other States, of course they are liable to go to the penitentiary under this bill.

The next clause is:

Fourth. To fix a standard or figure whereby the price to the public shall be in any manner controlled or established of any article, commodity, merchandise, produce, or commerce intended for sale, use, or consumption.

If two or more persons fix the price at which they will sell any article they have got to go to the penitentiary. Well, I think they ought to. [Laughter.]

The next clause is:

Fifth. To create a monopoly in the making, manufacture, purchase, sale, or transportation of any merchandise, article, produce, or commodity.

If two or more persons combine to create a monopoly they are to go to the penitentiary. "Monopoly" is a very difficult word to define. It has several significations. Its legal signification is something created by law which gives a special privilege. Of course it can not apply when all the world can go into the manufacture. It is not then, legally speaking, a monopoly. Popularly speaking, where a man has accumulated a large amount of money and carries on a large business, he is called a monopolist. Whether this is to abolish all the laws of all the States which have organized corporations, and the patent laws of the United States, which create the greatest monopolies of the country, will be left for the courts to construe, and they will have some difficulty, I think, in doing it. Next:

Sixth. To make, or enter into, or execute, or carry out any contract, obligation, or agreement of any kind or description by which they shall bind or shall have bound themselves not to manufacture, sell, dispose of, or transport any article or commodity, or article of trade, use, merchandise, or consumption below a common standard figure, or by which they shall agree, in any manner, to keep the price of such article, commodity, or transportation at a fixed or graduated figure or by which they shall in any manner establish or settle the price of any article, commodity, or transportation between themselves, or between themselves and others, so as to preclude free and unrestricted competition among themselves and others in the sale and transportation of any such article or commodity, or by which they shall agree to pool, combine, or unite in any interest they may have in connection with the sale or transportation of any such article or commodity that its price may in any manner be so affected.

That would absolutely preclude the possibility of those engaged in any kind of business fixing any price upon their goods which they are going to sell in other States. If two or more persons or firms should agree not to dispose of their goods unless a certain price should be obtained, which goods were to be transported to another State, that would be criminal under this clause; and the multiplicity of crimes that business men would be likely to commit every day would be beyond conception if that were the law.

I think that as the bill now stands it will answer every purpose that anybody may desire in the embarrassment of trade and business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. The Chair would suggest that the Senator from Wisconsin desires to modify his amendment. The modification will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 12 of the amendment, after the word "within," strike out the words "the jurisdiction of;" so as to read: Running and to be served anywhere within the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as modified.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to offer the slightest obstacle to the passage of this measure. I have expressed my doubts in regard to this bill, and have said all I propose to say as to its provisions, but I find in the RECORD of this morning a statement by the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] that I feel called upon to notice. I find this statement made by him which I did not hear, or I should have answered it at the time:

Mr. President, I am inclined to think, in view of the fact that but one member of the Committee on the Judiciary has given any expression that indicates a purpose to mature a law to repress the evil effects of trusts and to punish those engaged in them, that it is not best to refer these measures to that committee.

Now, there are but three members of the Judiciary Committee who have spoken at all upon this question—the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH]—and he is entirely in accord with every portion of the bill—and myself; but, as only two of us criticised the bill, it is fair to assume, and I take it for granted, that the remarks of the Senator from Texas were intended for the Senator from Mississippi and myself.

Mr. President, the statement is unjust and it is not based upon the facts. I stated emphatically, and as distinctly as my power of language would permit, that for six months I had been endeavoring to find a measure which I thought would be effective as against this great evil of trusts, and which would at the same time stand the legal criticism to which it must eventually be subjected; and, if I were disposed to speak of my personal history in connection with this matter of trusts I could refer to the fact alluded to to-day by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], that for eighteen months I have been engaged in a conflict with one of the greatest of the trusts, the most destructive in the entire country, and have received more abuse on account of my attacking it than from any other act of my public life.

The Senator from Mississippi in the early part of the session introduced a bill looking to the destruction of these trusts, and in the Judiciary Committee more than two months ago I asked for the appointment of a subcommittee in order, if possible, to have my doubts solved as a lawyer in regard to the measures on this subject pending before the Senate and House of Representatives. I undertook to say the other day, as plainly as I could, that I was willing to go just as far as I considered my oath as a Senator to support the Constitution would permit me to go in the direction indicated by the Senator from Ohio.

I am not here as the special advocate of, nor do I feel myself called upon to defend, the Judiciary Committee from the assaults made by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. I am, unfortunately, in the minority in that committee, and there are many measures reported by it which I do not approve of, but so far as this general question is concerned I can stand here with a clear conscience in regard to all I have done or said upon the subject.

Mr. President, we have had a remarkable winter. The warm breezes of summer have kissed the flowers during all the winter months, and we have now in public affairs a phenomenon equally as startling: a combination in loving embrace between the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], while my venerable friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], in a patriarchal and benedictory mood, stands by and blesses the alliance, and says, "Love each other, my children, and be happy." Why, I remember a very few years ago, when the oleomargarine bill was before the Senate, the columbian eloquence of every Senator on this side of the Chamber—if I mistake not, including the Senator from North Carolina—was heard denouncing the use of the revenue power of the Government as a police power. The oleomargarine bill pretended to be a revenue bill, although it was an open secret that the Government needed no revenue, and it was simply intended as a police regulation.

But what have we here to-day? Here is a bill that upon its very face says, as it stands now before the Senate, that it proposed to use the revenue power for the undisguised purpose of effecting police purposes, in language so distinct and plain that a wayfaring man, although he could not read, would be able to understand it.

That for the purpose of preventing as far as may be the dealing in options and futures as herein defined special taxes are imposed.

No pretense that it is to collect revenue, no pretense that it is anything else but the bald, naked use of the revenue power of the Government for police regulation; and yet, sir, it will be supported with a unanimity utterly unparalleled in this Chamber.

For myself I shall say nothing more about the Constitution. I am prepared to join the procession. I heard once of a hunting party who went into camp and made an agreement that the first man who complained of any dish set before him at the camp table should cook for a week. One happened to kill an old and very tough crow, and, as he was acting as cook for the mess, he prepared it for the table, and every man swore it was the most delicious morsel that ever went into his mouth. The Farmers' Alliance are cooking now, and there is no dish that can be put on this Senatorial table which will not go down with a gusto that will astonish any gourmand from the restaurants of Paris.

Mr. President, I simply rise, not to make an argument, but to suggest that I should like before the debate closes to hear from the Senator from Ohio whether he believes the clauses now incorporated in this bill which propose to originate in the Senate of the United States a revenue measure are constitutional or not. This bill does not come from the House of Representatives. It has not even the poor excuse that it was originated in the House, and that we have struck out the whole and put in a substitute by way of amendment. This is an original bill to raise revenue, providing revenue, putting on a tax, and it performs the most remarkable act of legislative legerdemain ever known since the foundation of the world. It licenses an illegal combination which it denounces as opposed to the laws of the United States and all the States. In other words, we say to the option dealers, "You are a lot of criminals, thieves, and robbers, but if you will give us a thousand dollars we will let you go on robbing." I shall be obliged to the Senator from Ohio if he will explain what is his opinion of those clauses of this bill, to say nothing about the feature which we have discussed before, that propose to levy taxes under the revenue power of the Government exercised by the Senate of the United States without any originating act upon the part of the House of Representatives.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, it was certainly the furthest from my desire to do any wrong to any Senator by any statement I may have made. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] was in his place when I made the remark to which he has called attention this morning. I knew when I made that remark what the Senator had stated here upon the floor. I knew when I made that remark what the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] had said and done on that subject.

The idea which I intended to convey—perhaps I may not have been happy in the choice of the words I employed—was that but one member of the Judiciary Committee had expressed himself favorable to legislation on this subject, and that in the discussion the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Mississippi had furnished us with many criticisms upon the propositions before the Senate. No doubt there was ground for a good deal of the criticism which they made; but it occurred to me that the criticisms were so general, so sweeping, as to cover everything which had been presented or could be presented to the Senate on this subject.

I called attention to the fact that the Senator from Mississippi said that he had been five years trying to formulate something on this subject and the Senator from Missouri has just told us that he has been five months trying to formulate something on this subject.

Now, Mr. President, is it true that the Constitution of the United States gives Congress no power over this subject? Will either of the distinguished Senators affirm that that is true? Are they not compelled to concede that we have certainly some power over the subject. If we have some power over the subject, has it taken that long for these Senators to discover that they can not find where that power exists nor how it is to be exercised?

Mr. President, I have made my share of criticism on the provisions of the bill, and I have had an ample amount of criticism on the portion which I have participated in making. However, I have not been hunting for criticisms and speculations that would defeat this bill or any bill with this object in view; but I have been trying to see if it were not possible for this Senate to mature a measure which would arrest and punish combinations and trusts that are robbing and plundering the people of this country. That is what I am hunting for.

I stated, when giving my consent to place my bill as an amendment to the bill of the Senator from Ohio, that while I doubted whether the provisions of that bill were sufficient, except so far as the general purpose of the first part of the first section was declared, I believed that the part which I added to it had actual virtue in it and would do good, and I felt under the circumstances that it was better to put it there, if possible, and get all we could of good in order to meet the great evils which the Senator from Missouri concedes, and which all other Senators here concede, and which are notorious to the country.

The Senator has alluded to the great cattle trust which he has been combating; he has seen and known of evils growing out of that; and the great sugar trust has been referred to, which the whole country feels the effects of; and so of the cotton-seed-oil trust, by which a combination has crushed the cotton-seed-oil manufacturers throughout the South and stopped the mills wherever it was to their interest to do so by paying interest upon the investment rather than let the establishments run in competition, and thus they fix the price of oil and cotton-seed as they please and by their monopoly they put down the price of cotton seed about one-third and put up the price of oil to whatever they please by a monopoly.

The people that I in part represent feel the effects of these trusts both in cattle and cotton-seed oil. They feel their effects in many other things. So I have felt and so I have tried, during this and the last Congress, by the best efforts I was able to make, to see if we could not devise a law that would arrest and prevent these trusts as far as the jurisdiction of Congress would go. I have said from the beginning, and I repeat again, that the power which we have over this question comes from the commerce clause of the Constitution. If it comes from any other source, I do not know where to trace it. I have limited the bill which I presented to an execution of the commerce power of the Constitution and to preventing the evils complained of as far as it seemed to me they might be prevented by Congress. It would be assuming a great deal for me to say that I know I have succeeded in doing it, but I say I believe I have presented a proposition to the Senate under which the owners and managers of trusts and persons connected with them may be indicted and convicted.

Mr. President, it is very easy for gentlemen to assume that everybody is wrong but themselves. I heard the Senator from Missouri upbraid the Senator from Ohio yesterday for his broad assumption of knowledge that others had not. I shall not retort upon the Senator from Missouri, but he should remember that there are others who have tried to read the Constitution as well as himself, who have tried to understand the Constitution as well as himself, who stand responsible upon their oaths of office to their God and to the people who sent them here to discharge their duties, and who, it is to be presumed, intend to conscientiously perform their duty. I intend to do so, whether it happens that I agree with the Senator from Missouri or not. I shall do what I can do in my view of the Constitution to arrest and punish these trusts, and if I err on either side I mean to err on the side of trying to do something rather than to err on the side of hypercritical criticisms which look, it seems to me, to the defeat of any possible proposition which may come before the Senate.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I have introduced no bill here upon this subject, although I have prepared one and propose to submit it for what it is worth at the time when the committee of which I am chairman makes its report. I have not stood here in this Senate and, because a pet measure of my own was not supported by other Senators, taunted them with a disposition to do nothing.

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator ought not to make that statement. I have done no such thing.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Texas says that it looks to him very much as if those of us who are throwing obstacles in the way of this legislation are indulging in hypercriticism and attempting to do nothing. If his language did not mean that, then I can not hear and I can not interpret when I do hear.

I do not propose to interfere between the Senator from Texas and his Creator. That is a delicate relation. I have nothing whatever to do with his conscience. It is all I can do to keep my own quiet. I have nothing to do with his construction of the Constitution. I know that the Constitution has been the source of a great deal of contention, criticism, and debate. I am trying in my own feeble way to preserve my oath to support the Constitution as I can best do it.

The Senator speaks of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution. I agree with him as to that, but I confess at the beginning under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States the remedy that was in us to exercise under that clause of the Constitution was not at all commensurate with the enormous evils which we propose to remedy. That is the trouble. Because I am not able to say honestly that I believe these bills presented here are full and complete and in accordance with the Constitution, I am to be told that I am trying to do nothing, and we have here par excellence the friends of the people, who are struggling and worrying to preserve them, while some of us are sitting here spectators and worse than spectators, attempting to throw obstacles in the way of this gigantic reform!

Now, sir, I only claim that I am endeavoring to do my duty as I see it, and I do not interfere with anybody else's conscientious convictions upon that subject. If I am not able to see that these bills are in accordance with the Constitution, if I am not able to see that they will not stand the crucible of the criticism through which they must go in the Supreme Court of the United States, I do not propose to have it said to me that I am in the way of the judicial or legal ability of my colleagues. That is all, sir.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, I was not present yesterday when the amendments to this bill were adopted. In looking over the RECORD of the last sitting, and considering the amendments which have been adopted, I ask myself whether the Senate of the United States is seriously engaged in the attempt to impair or destroy what are known as trusts, or whether it is simply engaged in a sham battle, playing the rôle of Don Quixotes.

When this bill came up at the last session, I rose and asked the Senator from Ohio whether it was his intention by this bill to deal with existing trusts or future trusts; that is to say, we know that all the great trusts have been already formed, they could be easily enumerated, and their enumeration would include all the great products and industries known to our country. Strange to say, the Senator could not then state distinctly whether the bill referred to actually existing trusts—that is, trusts in esse, such as the sugar trust, the lead trust, and other trusts—or whether it applied to the shadowy and non-existent trusts to be formed in the future. Under the law which was then proposed and under this bill—for, of course, when the Congress of the United States enacts a penal statute it can only operate in the future—I take it that there will be very few trusts created in defiance of the law. Therefore, if the bill did not apply to the existing trusts, you would have a statute which did not reach any existing evil, and you would have a statute which would operate in the future, which would be entirely inoperative and nugatory.

I have the colloquy which took place between the Senator from Ohio and myself at that time, and I will read it:

Mr. EUSTIS. I would ask the Senator from Ohio whether this proposed law is to apply, as I understand it, only to future trusts, or whether he desires that it shall be applied to existing trusts? The reason I ask the question is this: A great many of these trusts are already in existence. That is the evil which, as I understand, is to be reached by this new legislation.

The Senator from Ohio replied to my question as follows:

Mr. SHERMAN. As far as I can perceive I think that the continuing agreement, arrangement, combination, etc., such as described in the first section will become illegal on the passage of this act, and not before. Our laws can not be made retroactive.

Then I offered the following amendment in order to reach existing trusts:

SEC. —. That any person who, ninety days after the passage of this law, shall act as a manager, officer, trustee, or agent of any arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination as described in the first section, shall be liable to the penalties prescribed in the fourth section.

The language of the bill which we are discussing is the same as the language which is used in the bill that I criticize; that is to say:

That all arrangements and contracts made with a view or which tend to prevent full and free competition, etc.

So that if the Senate of the United States had adopted my amendment, which provided a penalty and which struck at existing trusts, the effect of the legislation under my amendment would have been to destroy the existing trusts. Yet, in the face of that, we have a bill reported by the Senator from Ohio, which, under his own interpretation at the last session, does not in the remotest degree affect any existing trust.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. EUSTIS. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana on this point what construction he puts upon section 3 of the bill in regard to its efficiency.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator from Louisiana be kind enough to read again the words he quotes as to my declaration? I do not remember to have made a declaration as broad as that. If I did it could not have any weight.

Mr. EUSTIS. The Senator from Ohio, in answer to the question which I propounded whether this proposed law was to apply to future trusts or whether he desires that it should be applied to existing trusts, said:

Mr. SHERMAN. As far as I can perceive, I think that the continuing agreement, arrangement, combination, etc., such as described in the first section will become illegal on the passage of this act, and not before. Our laws can not be made retroactive. But I do not see myself any objection to making the continuance of a combination like this after proper days' notice an offense. I think, however, thirty days' notice is too short, because a law of this kind ought to have a broad circulation before it becomes operative.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it does apply to existing trusts where they continue to do the acts complained of after the passage of the law.

Mr. EUSTIS. They are simply declared null and void. Now, the proposition of the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is that all persons engaged in the creation of any trust commit a misdemeanor. Of course, that only applies to the future.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the Senator will not stop reading there.

Mr. EUSTIS. I will read the whole of it:

That all persons engaged in the creation of any trust—

Mr. REAGAN. It goes on:

or as owner or part owner, agent, or manager of any trust.

Mr. EUSTIS. Yes, "employed." Does not that refer to the creation, I ask the Senator from Texas?

That all persons engaged in the creation of any trust, or as owner or part owner, agent, or manager of any trust employed in any business carried on with any foreign country.

Does the Senator construe that to apply immediately after the passage of this act?

Mr. REAGAN. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. EUSTIS. Immediately after the passage of this act?

Mr. REAGAN. It commences to take trusts as they are and make them unlawful.

Mr. EUSTIS. But immediately after the passage of this act?

Mr. REAGAN. It can not operate until after its passage.

Mr. EUSTIS. Of course; I understand that.

Mr. REAGAN. And at common law they are unlawful already.

Mr. EUSTIS. Then do I understand the Senator's amendment to mean that the manager or agent of any trust company existing at the time of the passage of this act commits a misdemeanor the day after its passage?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EUSTIS. I ask the Senator whether he does not think that is too harsh, and whether it would not be better to provide that the act shall not take effect for ninety days?

Mr. REAGAN. I have no objection, if it is thought best, to give them reasonable notice. I would accept an amendment, if it is thought advisable to do so, which would give notice and give time for people to abandon these combinations, though they are not entitled to much mercy.

Mr. BUTLER (to Mr. REAGAN). The Reporter can not hear you.

Mr. REAGAN. These combinations have robbed the people without mercy themselves, and they are doing about what is unlawful at common law. I do not know; I think probably I shall not accept the amendment suggested.

I was notified that I could not be heard by the Reporters. I want to say in their presence and to the Senate that I shall not hereafter hold myself responsible, and I hope nobody else will hold me responsible, for the reports of my remarks in our debates here. I find that in what I said yesterday what I thought was very emphatic and very clear, and in close hearing of the Reporters, some of it was so reported that I do not know how to revise it.

Mr. EUSTIS. If the provisions of the bill, beginning at the first section, apply to existing trusts, and if the penal provision applies to the managers or agents of an existing trust immediately after the passage of the law—

Mr. HOAR. It also, I will suggest to the Senator from Louisiana, includes the owner of stock in a corporation so employed.

Mr. EUSTIS. It is to cover the case of existing trusts; and I am perfectly willing to strain a point to vote for such a bill as that. I have had some very serious difficulty in reaching that conclusion, but very able lawyers think that it is constitutional, and I am willing to acquiesce in their judgment so far; but I can not vote for this measure for the reason that upon many propositions I have no sort of doubt whatever as to its unconstitutionality. I refer to contracts in what are known as "futures." I should like to know what the Congress of the United States has to do with the Cotton Exchange, for instance, in New Orleans dealing in futures. I notice that nearly all the articles which are referred to with regard to future contracts are things that people consume: wheat, corn, oats, rye, barley; but the authors of the measure have included cotton. If we are going to include cotton why do we not include steel rails? People are as liable to eat steel rails as they are to eat cotton.

Why do we not include lead or salt? Why do we not include everything? Why do we not include manufactured cotton goods, a subject with reference to which there are very large operations in futures in Boston and in New York, Philadelphia, and elsewhere? If the broad proposition be that Congress should declare its policy upon the question of gambling, of which I confess I know very little; if the States have become so debilitated and emasculated and if the people of the States have become so demoralized that we are to surrender the whole question of police, of policy, and of public morality to the Congress of the United States, for one it will not be done by my vote.

Where are we going to stop? If the State of Louisiana, for its own interest and from its own motives, owing no apology to any other State or to the Government of the United States, chooses to legalize contracts in futures with reference to cotton, by which a large and most respectable portion of our population make a living, which many and many a time have enabled the planter to get a much higher price for his product than he would get in the absence of a cotton exchange, when the planter many and many a time has been able to protect himself against flood and unfavorable seasons by making a future contract in cotton—if the State of Louisiana chooses to consider that a perfectly proper and legitimate business, a business that should exist and should be sustained by the State, from which the State derives a revenue, and legalizes that business, where is the authority of Congress to step in and tell the State of Louisiana or any other State that those contracts are illegal and immoral and shall be suppressed by the power of Congressional legislation?

Mr. President, I am not surprised that a Republican Senator should have introduced such an amendment as this. I am not surprised that it should receive votes from Republican Senators, who believe that what they call nationality has been substituted for the Constitution of the United States, who believe that we have nothing in fact but a parliamentary government whose powers are supreme and indisputable, a government of the majority which can control the minority, that there are no balances, no adjustments, no limitations in our system of government; but it would be amazing to me to find that a Democratic Senator should vote for it, who believes that the police powers, ever since the foundation of this Government, belong exclusively to the State; that each State government is responsible to the people inhabiting that State for the exercise of that police power; and that whenever the Congress of the United States undertakes to regulate that State power, that police power, in defiance of the sovereign will of the State, then you attempt the grossest usurpation that has ever been attempted in the history of our Government. Then it will be that the people will be ready to lay down their liberties and their rights on the footstool that you create by your legislation, and surrender every principle of local and self government. It will then be that our Federal Government will become not only central, but overshadowing. It will be the only voice that can speak to the people of the United States. To this source alone will they look for their rights and for their liberties, if any they have left. Strike down once the police power of the State, which is the supreme attribute of its sovereignty, invade that sacred domain by this bill, declare what is immoral, what is illegal, what is proper, what is reprehensible with reference to a purely domestic, local, and State question, and then you will have statehood stand as nothing but a mockery and a sham, an emblem of what was great in the past, but has disappeared for the future.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, I simply rise to say that in charging an alliance between myself and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] I think the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] did not act in a christian spirit. We are told, sir, that there should be more rejoicing over one sinner that repenteth than over ninety and nine just persons, like the Senator from Missouri and myself, who need no repentance. [Laughter.] As the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Ohio had just dissolved a very successful alliance for defeating the proposition to extend aid to educate the poor, illiterate children of the South, it seemed to me that the Senator from Missouri ought to have congratulated the Senator and myself that we had come together at last on a platform attempting to do something for the good of the people.

I do not suppose that there is a stump in the United States of America which ever contained an orator on either side, of any shade of political opinion, even including that neuter gender called a Mugwump, but has made the circumambient atmosphere resound with denunciations of trusts and combinations. We put it in our platforms; we put it on the headlines of our campaign papers and circulating campaign documents; we talk at the fire-side and everywhere in denunciation of trusts and combinations.

We are all the friends of the people. We are all enemies to these illegal combinations of capital which devour the substance of the people and grind the faces of the poor. But when it comes to putting that friendship to the test we find that every proposition which human Senatorial ingenuity can suggest bristles with legal and constitutional objections. "We are your friend, farmer; we are your friend, little fish who are being swallowed up by the big ones; would to God we could help you, but we can not."

Now, Mr. President, my profession of regard for the people and their interests, as contradistinguished from those of the combinations of capital in this country, is a sincere one, and those expressions have characterized me ever since I was in political life. So far as my recollection extends, there is not a single vote that I have ever given in this or other legislative bodies which was not as I believed in the interests of the people.

It may be, sir, that these constitutional objections are valid, but at all events there is certainly ingenuity and legal learning enough in this body to devise some measure to correct these evils of which every one complains, these trusts that have even extended to the bagging that envelops the cotton of the planter in the South, to the plow with which the Western and Southern farmers stir the soil. There is scarcely any article of prime necessity in this country as to which the people do not complain that its price has been enhanced by these combinations.

Now, we ought either to do something or we ought to say to the people "It is not worth while to talk about the subject; the Constitution of the United States gives no power whatsoever to Congress to redress these evils, and you must look to the States alone." As honest men we must tell them that, if it be the truth, and let them endeavor to find redress in their State Legislatures.

For one, sir, I am willing to make an effort to do something. So far as the amendment which was proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], which has been adopted and has now become a part of the bill, is concerned, I did not vote for it. I was not in the Chamber when it was adopted. It was agreed to without a yea-and-nay vote, in the confusion which was in the Senate yesterday in regard to the various amendments and propositions submitted upon the bill. I acknowledge that is an unconstitutional amendment. I believe it to be so, so far as a layman has any right to express a constitutional view.

Mr. GEORGE. Which amendment is that?

Mr. VANCE. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], which is undoubtedly a revenue bill, and such a bill can not under the Constitution originate in this body. I admit that. I expect to vote to strike it out of the bill, but should it be adopted I believe that I shall still continue in support of the bill, believing that the courts can decide that portion of the law as it will then be, unconstitutional, without interfering with or disturbing the remainder, for it is not at all dependent upon the remainder of the bill, nor is the remainder of the bill dependent upon it.

I am determined, so far as it is in my power, to do something to repress the operation of these trusts and combinations, and having done my endeavor so far as I am able to do it, then the results rest not with me. I make no imputations upon other Senators. If I ever have done it, I have not been correct in doing so, because it is not the thing to do here. We are all responsible to our own consciences for our actions and for our views of the Constitution. But I say that it is our duty either to do something to repress these trusts and combinations or stop talking to the people about them. So far as the imputation is made that my action or that of any other Senator is influenced by the Farmers' Alliance, I say that the demagoguery of the whole proposition consists in continuing to talk to the people as though we could do something when we know that we can not do anything.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. VANCE. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator know any gentleman on this side of the Chamber who denies that Congress has the constitutional power to do something?

Mr. VANCE. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. Who is it?

Mr. VANCE. I am one of the Senators myself who believe that Congress can do something to remedy these evils.

Mr. GEORGE. Who denies that Congress can do something, I ask?

Mr. VANCE. Oh, I did not understand the question. I do not deny it, but it so happens that every proposition ever made so far meets with a constitutional objection.

Mr. GEORGE. Now, I will ask the Senator another question, if he will allow me.

Mr. VANCE. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Does he not believe that the great mother of these trusts lies in a protective tariff?

Mr. VANCE. I do.

Mr. GEORGE. Then if the duty were taken off the articles which are manufactured by the trusts, would not that be a constitutional remedy?

Mr. VANCE. It would, so far as those performances are concerned which are enacted behind the wall of the protective tariff; but there are others which are not behind that wall, and I want to strike at them all, every one of them. As a matter of course, the great bulk of the articles the purchase price of which is enhanced by combinations are protected by the tariff law which excludes the competition of foreign articles, and it would break down their combination if those articles were admitted freely into this country or upon the payment of a reasonable duty. There is no doubt about that; but there are many other articles which would be unaffected by any action we might take in regard to the tariff, and for that reason I am in favor of doing what is before us to be done, rather than waiting for the trusts to be broken down by a reduction of tariff duties.

The Senator from Mississippi knows as well as I do and as well as any other Senator that there is no earthly prospect of reducing tariff duties for the purpose of suppressing trusts. Yesterday, upon the vote on the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], which authorized the President of the United States to suspend the tariff duties whenever he may be satisfied that trusts are formed under their protection, the Senator saw at once how promptly every Senator on the other side rallied to the rescue of the tariff.

Mr. GEORGE. Including the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], who voted against the amendment offered by his colleague.

Mr. REAGAN. What is that?

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from North Carolina, in alluding to the vote yesterday upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], which struck down tariff duties when they were fostering these trusts, said that every Senator on the other side of the Chamber very promptly voted against it. I called his attention to the fact—I thought it was a fact, and, if it is not, the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] can correct me—that the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] voted with the other side on that proposition.

Mr. REAGAN. I voted against the adoption of my colleague's amendment as a substitute for the entire bill. I understand that the provision which the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from North Carolina refer to is in that substitute, but it had not been mentioned in the debate, and I doubt if many members knew it was there. I did not vote against it on that ground, but for the reason that I had a better provision to substitute for it, in my judgment, than that was, because I relied on the commerce clause of the Constitution for my authority and because that relied for its constitutional authority upon an act of a State Legislature to create Federal jurisdiction, and I did not choose to vote for a substitute which I did not believe derived its power from the right source to supplant another which I did believe was derived from the right source. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will not set me down as a high-tariff man because of that vote.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, no. I only made that suggestion to relieve my friends on the other side of the Chamber from the charge made against them by the Senator from North Carolina. If the excuse given by the Senator from Texas is good for him, it is good for the Senators on the other side; that is all.

Mr. REAGAN. If the Senator from Mississippi thinks he can deter me from the discharge of my duty according to my convictions by telling me that I am voting with the wrong side, he misapprehends the man. When I believe I am right, if I stood alone in front of all the world I would do it. If I believe I am right, I care not what party it takes me to, I will go with it. So the Senator need not think that he can twit me by saying that I have been voting with the Republican side of the Chamber. Let him assume to champion a measure which I have said in my judgment had no authority under the Constitution to defeat one which rested upon the commerce clause of the Constitution. That is where I stood.

It is immaterial to me what side I stand on in standing for what I believe to be my duty, and the Senator will not intimidate me from the discharge of duty by any statement that I vote with the opposite side.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] has the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. I beg leave to say a word.

Mr. VANCE. I yield once more.

Mr. GEORGE. I think I ought to answer the charge of attempted intimidation. I can assure my distinguished friend from Texas that I meant no harm; that I did not intend to intimidate him or to deter him. The Senator from North Carolina in his speech assailed my friends on the other side (whom I assail sometimes, but I do not like to see them assailed unjustly) upon the ground that they had voted against a proposition to suspend the operations of the tariff as a means of suppressing trusts. His condemnation was directed entirely to our friends upon the other side, and I merely called his attention to the fact that he was unjust in confining his denunciation to the other side; that in that vote was included the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], who is par excellence a Democrat and a friend of the people.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the Senator from North Carolina allow me a moment?

Mr. VANCE. If I can get permission I will take my seat, for I am about through, anyhow.

Mr. REAGAN. I want to say just one word.

Mr. VANCE. I now yield the floor for all intents and purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas will proceed.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not want to take the Senator off the floor.

Mr. VANCE. I was about done. Go ahead.

Mr. REAGAN. I would not do injustice to the motives of the Senator from Mississippi, but the Senator took occasion a few days ago, when I had no opportunity to reply, to call attention to my inconsistency about something. If I had had occasion to reply then, I should have said that a Senator who could make as able a constitutional argument as he could make for a strict construction of the Constitution and then vote for the Blair bill ought to understand the full force of the word "inconsistency."

Mr. GEORGE. Well, Mr. President, I do not care to quarrel with my friend because he could not see in the Constitution of the United States the power to give money from an overflowing Treasury to educate the poor people of this country who had lost their property by the results of the war. I acquit him of anything wrong on that subject. My constitutional views have been expressed here, and if the Senator does not like them, either upon this subject or upon any other, he has the liberty which every American citizen has to try to show that I am wrong.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], which has been read.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I desire to say that there seems to be a very great misconception of the character of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS]. I think myself that that amendment is not germane to the subject of the bill introduced by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], and I believe it is totally out of place and ought never to have been connected at all with the bill for the suppression of trusts and combinations. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas, it seems to be understood by my friend from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS], operates against dealing in futures by cotton exchanges in the South. There is nothing whatever in the bill that prevents a cotton exchange, or any farmer, any cotton-owner, in the South or anywhere else, from selling his cotton to be delivered at any time in the future. It only aims at dealing in these commodities when they are not owned, and when it is a part of the contract of sale that they are not to be delivered. I understand that to be the express provision of the bill.

Mr. EUSTIS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PUGH. Certainly.

Mr. EUSTIS. Does not the amendment aim to prevent what is known as dealing in futures?

Mr. PUGH. In the way specified in the bill—that is, by making contracts to deliver commodities not owned by the parties to the contract at the time and never intended to be delivered.

I will state further that, as a lawyer engaged in the trial of a case involving the character of this business, I examined the best-informed men in the city of New York upon that subject, and every one of the witnesses testified that in that system established in New York by which they dealt in futures there was not a single transaction in which any party to it would say it was no part of the agreement that there was not to be an actual delivery of the commodity. Every one of them will testify to-day, I have no doubt, as they have done in the past within my knowledge, every member of these cotton exchanges, every man who is engaged in this business of selling for future delivery, will swear that it is no part of the contract between the parties that there is not to be a delivery of the article sold for future delivery.

I say that under this bill there will be no license issued to any man who wants to engage in the business as it is going on to-day in the country, and I look upon the amendment as being utterly useless and harmless in its operation. I state these facts from personal knowledge and from the express provisions of the bill.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, I desire to correct my friend from Alabama. What is known as a contract in futures is this: A person buys or sells a thousand bales of cotton deliverable at a fixed date. There is nothing whatsoever in the contract to show whether he intends to deliver the thousand bales or not. When the contract matures he can do one of two things, at his option: He can either deliver actually the thousand bales of cotton according to the grade called for by the contract, and the seller is bound to receive the thousand bales of cotton, or he can pay the difference in the market between the time that the contract was made and the time of the delivery. That is the way the business is conducted in New Orleans; that is the way the business is conducted in Liverpool. Not quite a year ago there was a man by the name of Steiner, who made a corner in cotton at Liverpool, and every ship that he could get all over the world was loaded with cotton by those people who had made contracts in order to tender him the actual cotton, which they did, and that prevented him from reaping the enormous profit which he otherwise would have secured.

There is no question whatever that in New Orleans and in Liverpool, and I take it in New York, and Mobile, and Memphis, and every other city they have only one system of business, and that regulated by what is known as the National Exchange, composed of all these cotton exchanges in the various cities, and that is one of their rules. I know that is the way they conduct their business; there is nothing in the contract to show what the intention of the parties is except that it is understood generally that they will settle the difference when the contract matures; but if a man chooses to go and sell one hundred thousand bales of cotton and tender them to the purchaser he has the right to do that, and the purchaser is obliged to take them under what is known as a future contract. That is the business that is conducted in New Orleans.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I understood the Senator to state that this bill prevented cotton-growers in the South from selling their cotton for future delivery. I deny that that can be the effect of the bill. In the next place, I would ask that Senator what there is in the bill which would prevent the Cotton Exchange in New Orleans from selling to a manufacturer at Lowell a thousand bales of cotton for delivery, selling them in the spring or summer for delivery to a manufacturer in Lowell? What is there in the bill to prevent that transaction?

Then again, if it is no part of the contract, as he admits, that this commodity, whatever it may be, provisions, food, or cotton, is not to be delivered at the time when the contract is to be performed by delivery, what is there in the bill to prevent the parties from arranging to settle upon the actual value of the cotton in the market at the time of the delivery and accepting the money in the place of cotton? What is there in the bill to prevent a man from selling 10,000 bushels of wheat for future delivery, and at the time when the contract requires the actual delivery, can not the parties under that contract agree upon the value of the wheat and settle the difference? I do not see anything whatever in the bill to prevent that transaction, to prevent dealings of that character.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I have no desire whatever to enter into this debate at this stage of it, but I think my friend from Alabama has clearly overlooked the whole object and purport of the bill. If I understand the text, the first thing that a man must do before he can carry out the agreement to which the Senator refers, he must pay a tax under the internal-revenue system.

Mr. PUGH. There is no tax necessary to enable parties, any number of them, members of the Cotton Exchange or producers, to deal in these commodities when they are to be actually delivered. There is the bill to speak for itself.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I have misunderstood the entire purport of it; that is very certain.

Mr. PUGH. I call on the author of the bill, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], to know if I am not correct in my construction.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator from Alabama who sits farthest from me [Mr. PUGH] correctly indicates the purpose of the amendment which I had the honor to submit and which has been adopted by a practically unanimous vote of the Senate. It is not intended in any manner whatever to interfere with the bargain, purchase, sale, or exchange of any product of which the parties may be possessed, or of which they may be the producers, or which they intend actually to deliver, provided they are the owners of it. It is directed against that gigantic modern invention known as dealing in futures, conspiracies artificially to raise the prices of products, to change the value of products, to create artificial scarcity of products, to juggle with values irrespective of ownership by processes that are just as nefarious and just as reprehensible as those of the poker-table or the faro-bank, in which there is no pretense of ownership, in which there is often an agreement to sell ten or fifty times more than the annual product of what is offered in the market, the sole purpose being to enable those "who neither toil nor spin," but who are clad in purple and fare sumptuously every day, to settle up on the 1st day of October, or the 1st day of November, if it may be, the difference between the price that they had bet a certain product would bear on that date and the price at which the producer is compelled to sell it on that day.

If my amendment is susceptible of any other interpretation than that, if it can be tortured by any ingenuity into any other effect and operation than that, it is not what I intended; it is not what the Senate believed it to be when they voted for it; and all the ingenuity, all the casuistry, all the hair-splitting of those who for one reason or another are opposed to it, can not deceive anybody who does not desire to be deluded. There is not in this country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, a man so humble or so obscure outside of this Chamber who does not know exactly against what practice this amendment is directed. It is reserved for these great doctors of finance, these learned pundits who stand here, by one means and another to interfere between the law-making power and the rights of the people, to declare that there is something mysterious, something that is vague and undetermined about this amendment of mine.

I must complain, Mr. President, among other things, that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR], like Mrs. Malaprop in the celebrated comedy of Sheridan, cast aspersions upon my parts of speech, and declared that the orthography, or the orthoepy, or the syntax, or the prosody of the amendment might possibly be improved. In exculpation I have to say that it was drawn and prepared by an eminent member of the House of Representatives. It seemed to me to carry out more clearly and more accurately and more thoroughly than anything I had seen the purposes I had in view, and I offered it as an amendment to the pending bill. At every stage of the proceeding it has been met by the interposition of some question of order; some question of etiquette, that it ought to have proceeded from some other committee; some question of the Constitution, that it infringed the great reserved rights of the States; some question of locality, that it ought to have appeared in some other place in the bill.

Like those who were bidden in the Scriptures to attend the wedding feast, those who are invited to vote for this amendment, which they all admit is directed against a pernicious, nefarious, and most reprehensible practice, with one consent begin to make excuses. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] and others question the sincerity, question the good faith, question the intelligence of those who offer and adhere to this amendment. The Senator from Louisiana desires to know if this is a sham battle. Another Senator rises and inquires if those who support this amendment are not playing the part of Don Quixote and fighting a windmill. Still another rises and intimates that this is being done at the dictation of the Farmers' Alliance, as if "the isle" had been frightened "from her propriety," and that we were trembling in a state of trepidation in this endeavor to do a great act of justice.

Mr. President, the people of the United States have a reasonable degree of respect for the Constitution, but they are not afraid of it. A constitution is a growth, and not a manufacture, and the Constitution of 1890, by reason of the operation of the will of the people who made it, is a vastly different instrument from the Constitution of 1789. Its authors would not know it. They made it for specific purposes, not for the object of enabling country lawyers to devise definitions, not for the purpose of interposing obstacles and barriers to the will of the people.

Let us refresh our recollection for an instant to see what the Constitution was made for—not by the States, either.

We the people of the United States—

And for what?—

In order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

Therefore, Mr. President, we are instructed what the purpose and object of "the people of the United States" was in the formation of the Constitution under which we live and which is perpetually invoked by the narrow and rigid and illiberal constructionists to interpose an insuperable barrier against every effort to better the condition of the people. Sir, the people of the United States do not regard the Constitution with superstition or awe. They know that there are some things more venerable than charters, more sacred than constitutions, and those are the rights and the privileges which charters and constitutions were ordained to establish and to maintain. At every stage of national growth and progress we have been met by the interposition of these minute and insectivorous propositions that the Constitution was a barrier against the determined and resolute will of the people, and we are taunted with bad faith, with false chivalry, with fighting sham battles when we attempt here to carry into effect a provision which I shall show before I get through with my statement is entirely within the limits and purview of the Constitution itself.

Mr. President, I can not conceive of anything that is more humorous, more grotesque, more qualified and competent to make the sides of the nation shake with derisive laughter, than for the Senator from Louisiana, and the Senator from Mississippi, and the Senator from Missouri, and their associates, to rise with terror upon every occasion and plead the Constitution with a simulation of terror as if the minutest abrasion of that sacred instrument would, as we are told at the death of Kosciuszko, make "freedom shriek." If I recollect aright, those gentlemen spent a considerable portion of time in endeavoring to destroy the Constitution. What is the secret of this new-found reverence for the Constitution? Did they bear it away in the ark of the covenant for four years and then bring it back to us as its chosen guardians, and be permitted in that same instant to taunt those who endeavor to carry out the ideas of national growth and progress with being the violators of the Constitution? There is a constant pleading of the oath that was taken to support the Constitution, as if those who differed with them in their interpretation of the Constitution were perjured and oblivious of their moral obligations.

It seems to me it will be a little more becoming for those men who are scourging us, who hold us up to public castigation, if they possess the modesty of opinion to recollect that their views of the Constitution have not been maintained by the people of this country. There has been no step in the national progress in the last thirty-five years against which the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Missouri have not arisen and declared that it was against the Constitution. I recollect there was a great demonstration that there was no power in the Constitution to coerce a State which saw fit to go out of the Union. But we found it, Mr. President; we found it somewhere in its latent recesses, "public welfare," "blessings of liberty," wherever it might be, we found it. We were told that the abolition of slavery was without warrant in the Constitution, but we found it, and when it could not be found in the letter it was amended by the sword. It is a fair warning to those who attempt to insist upon verbal and lingual interpretations against the will of the people, that whenever the elasticity, the capacity to carry out the wishes and the will of the people is not sufficient there will always be found a way to amend it.

So we were told when reconstruction came that there was no constitutional power to reconstruct the rebellious States. We were told there was no power in the Constitution to make a paper a legal tender. We were told, by the same men who are now declaiming against this bill and against those who support it as being pretenders and insincere and uncandid, that there was no power under the Constitution to make legal tender out of paper; and later on that there was no constitutional power to resume specie payments.

The other day, when there was a little resolution offered here to inquire into some violation of law in Mississippi, the whole organization rose up and said, "It is a violation of the Constitution. You have a right to go to England, to Germany, to Austria, to Spain, wherever the rights of an American citizen have been assailed, but there is no power in the Constitution to take care of the rights of an American citizen that have been assailed and overthrown in Mississippi." And later than that, upon a little petty question of convenience here in the Senate, when there was an order proposed for the election of a President pro tempore who should hold during the pleasure of the Senate, up rose the guardians of the Constitution and said there was no power to elect a President of this body except in the absence of the Vice-President.

I commend, Mr. President, to these construers of the Constitution the contemplation of the results of their criticisms for the last thirty years, and suggest whether it is not barely possible that they may be mistaken in invoking against this effort to relieve the people, for whom the Constitution was made, of one of the great, monstrous, crying evils of any century.

The Senator from North Carolina, prematurely, I think, the Senator from Alabama, improvidently, I think, said that the amendment proposed by me was outside the limits and purview of the Constitution in this, that it was a violation of the privilege and prerogative of the House of Representatives. To the two operating clauses of the Constitution I will call the attention of the Senate. Article I, section 7, says:

All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives.

That is plain; that is explicit; that is unmistakable. If this is a bill for raising revenue, I admit that it is improperly introduced into this body.

Section 8 says:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises—to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

For what?

I go further and I admit that if this measure which proposes to lay a tax is a bill for raising revenue then it is not properly in this body. I accept logically all the consequences of those declarations. There is the major premise; there is the minor premise; there is the conclusion. It is a syllogism. Bills for raising revenue must originate in the House of Representatives; this is a bill for raising revenue; therefore it can not properly originate in the Senate. But are the power to tax and the raising of revenue the same thing? Are they identical under the Constitution? Under section 8 is the exercise of the power to tax for the purpose of paying debts, providing for the common defense and general welfare of the United States, a bill for raising revenue? I deny it. I affirm that this is in no sense whatever a bill for raising revenue. It is not intended as a bill for raising revenue any more than the bill for the taxation of oleomargarine was intended for raising revenue. Everybody who voted for that bill or against it knew that it was not a bill for raising revenue. It was a bill that was introduced and passed for the purpose of suppressing the production of an article that was believed to be injurious to the general welfare of the United States, whether that belief was right or wrong. I did not believe in it myself.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Kansas has just said, and I think said truly, that every one knew that the real object of the oleomargarine bill was not to raise revenue, that it was for some other purpose, to wit, to suppress the manufacture and sale of a counterfeit article of food. I ask the Senator, if the real object of the bill had been expressed in its title and it had been entitled "A bill to prevent the manufacture and sale of counterfeit butter," whether he believes that the Supreme Court of the United States would have sustained its constitutionality.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not know whether the Supreme Court of the United States decides upon the constitutionality of acts by their titles or not. I never heard that it did. I never heard that the title was anything more than descriptive, and I should be very much surprised, indeed, to learn that as a matter of legislative declaration of intent and purpose the Supreme Court of the United States had ever minutely and critically examined the title of an act. I read from Story on the Constitution, volume 1, page 687 of the edition that I hold in my hand, section 965:

The language of the Constitution is: "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises." If the clause had stopped here and remained in this absolute form (as it was, in fact, when reported in the first draught in the convention) there could not have been the slightest doubt on the subject.

Now the material part comes in.

The absolute power to lay taxes includes the power in every form in which it may be used, and for every purpose to which the Legislature may choose to apply it. This results from the very nature of such an unrestricted power. A fortiori it might be applied by Congress to purposes for which nations have been accustomed to apply it. Now, nothing is more clear, from the history of commercial nations, than the fact that the taxing power is often, very often, applied for other purposes than revenue. It is often applied as a regulation of commerce. It is often applied—

And this becomes more interesting as I proceed—

It is often applied as a virtual prohibition upon the importation of particular articles, for the encouragement and protection of domestic products and industry; for the support of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures; for retaliation upon foreign monopolies and injurious restrictions; for mere purposes of State policy and domestic economy; sometimes to banish a noxious article of consumption—

Like oleomargarine—

sometimes as a bounty upon an infant manufacture or agricultural product; sometimes as a temporary restraint of trade; sometimes—

I call the attention of the doubting Thomases to this declaration:

sometimes as a suppression of particular employments; sometimes as a prerogative power to destroy competition and secure a monopoly to the Government.

Section 970:

If the common defense or general welfare—

The phrase employed in the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution—can be promoted by laying taxes in any other manner than for revenue, who is at liberty to say that Congress can not constitutionally exercise the power for such a purpose? No one has a right to say that the common defense and general welfare can never be promoted by laying taxes, except for revenue.

Those, therefore, who hold the opinion above stated must unavoidably maintain that the power to lay taxes is not confined to revenue, but extends to all cases where it is proper to be used for the common defense and general welfare.

Section 973:

So that, whichever construction of the power to lay taxes is adopted, the same conclusion is sustained, that the power to lay taxes is not by the Constitution confined to purposes of revenue. In point of fact it has never been limited to such purposes by Congress; and all the great functionaries of the Government have certainly maintained the doctrine that it was not constitutionally so limited.

If the authority of this great writer on constitutional law is worth anything, the power to raise revenue and the power to levy a tax are absolutely different. They are capable of being exercised by entirely different functions. We may tax irrespective of the question of revenue, and that is what is intended to be done in the amendment I proposed to the bill reported by the Senator from Ohio. That is the reason why the language in the ninth section, in the first and second lines, upon which the Senator from Louisiana animadverted, was inserted, not with any idea of leaving it doubtful whether this was a tax bill for the purpose of revenue or a bill for the suppression of a nefarious and reprehensible practice. I do not desire to be misunderstood, or mistaken, or misapprehended. Those words were inserted for a purpose, for the purpose of asserting affirmatively that under the Constitution, the power to tax being admitted to exist in order to suppress a traffic believed to be injurious, this was the intention and the design of the amendment.

But, sir, we are not without witnesses so far as the validity of the interpretation of the Constitution by Mr. Justice Story is concerned. I refer to the well known case in 8 Wallace, of Veazie Bank vs. Fenno, in which the power of the United States to levy a 10 per cent. tax upon the circulating medium of State banks, not for the purpose of raising a revenue, but for the purpose of destroying their circulation, was directly brought within the purview of the Supreme Court itself. The holding of the court was:

The tax of 10 per cent. imposed by the act of July 13, 1866, on the notes of State banks paid out after the 1st of August, 1866, is warranted by the Constitution—although it was admitted in the argument that the object and purpose of that tax was not to raise a revenue, but to suppress the circulation of the State banks and practically destroy it. I read the closing sentence of the opinion of the dissenting judges, who reached the same conclusion by a different route, disagreeing with some of the precepts laid down by the majority of the court in the decision, which was delivered by Chief-Justice Chase:

We say nothing as to the purpose of this heavy tax of some 16 per cent. upon the banks, 10 of which we can not but regard as imposed upon the power of the States to create them. Indeed, the purpose is scarcely concealed, in the opinion of the court, namely, to encourage the national banks. It is sufficient to add that the burden of the tax, while it has encouraged these banks, has proved fatal to those of the States; and if we are at liberty to judge of the purpose of an act from the consequences that have followed, it is not perhaps going too far to say that these consequences were intended.

Mr. BUTLER. How did the court stand, if I may ask the Senator? How many dissented?

Mr. INGALLS. Two dissented. Justices Nelson and Davis dissented. In further support of the same proposition I refer to the case in 101 United States Reports, of The National Bank vs. United States, in error to the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Arkansas. In this case the opinion was delivered by Mr. Chief-Justice Waite in October, 1879, and he alludes to the power of taxation and expounds it, and shows wherein it differs from the revenue power, and the fact that it can be used otherwise than for revenue purposes. This is his language:

The tax thus laid is not on the obligation, but on its use in a particular way. As against the United States, a State municipality has no right to put its notes in circulation as money. It may execute its obligations, but can not, against the will of Congress, make them money. The tax is on the notes paid out; that is, made use of as a circulating medium. Such a use is against the policy of the United States. Therefore, the banker who helps to keep up the use by paying them out, that is, employing them as the equivalent of money in discharging his obligations, is taxed for what he does.

The closing paragraph is as follows:

The taxation was no doubt intended to destroy the use; but that, as has just been seen, Congress had the power to do.

I think, unless some decisions or some argument or some evidence or the authority of some great writer can be adduced to the contrary, that those who have pronounced against the validity, the legality, the constitutionality of this amendment will see fit to revise their opinion. Unless this amendment which proposes to tax is intended to raise revenue it need not originate in the House of Representatives, because only those measures which are for raising revenue must originate in that place. I have shown by authority, by the express declaration of purpose, that this is not intended for the purpose of raising revenue, but for another purpose, in itself constitutional and expressed in the body of the bill itself; and therefore I contend that it is not obnoxious to the objections which have been urged.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the attention of the Senator from Kansas to a little matter of detail, which I may forget if I do not call his attention to it now. I wish to propose an amendment which I believe he will accede to. At the bottom of the fifth page, after the proviso at the end of section 7, I wish to add the words:

Or of articles to be consumed by the person to whom they are delivered or in his establishment.

The Senator will observe that the bill as it is now drawn, especially section 8, will be open to the criticism that it prohibits contracts for the delivery to large establishments like hotels of beef, or lard, or milk for the daily use of their customers, and that class of contracts which have no sort of connection with those aimed at; but it is better, I suppose, to have the phraseology of the bill clearly exclude that intention, and I ask him, therefore, if he sees any objection to the amendment which I propose.

Mr. INGALLS. I see none. I ask that it be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Massachusetts repeat the amendment?

Mr. HOAR. There will be unanimous consent, I presume, to make it now. I desire to add after the proviso at the bottom of the fifth page, in section 7, the words:

Or of articles to be consumed by the person to whom they are delivered or in his establishment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add at the end of the proviso in section 7 "or of articles to be consumed by the person to whom they are delivered or in his establishment;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That this act shall not apply to contracts for the delivery at any one time of articles of not more than $50 in value or of articles to be consumed by the person to whom they are delivered or in his establishment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be agreed to. The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I do not propose to detain the Senate at this time in the afternoon by making even a brief reply to what was said by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] in regard to the impropriety of those of us who, as he says, tried to destroy the Constitution during the late war in now having the immodesty and hardihood to ask that the provisions of the Constitution be honestly and faithfully carried out. If the result of the war, as claimed by the Senator from Kansas—for it is the legitimate consequence of his argument—was to put the entire Southern people outside of the pale of constitutional obligations and to put upon them the ban that they should never hereafter be permitted to question the violation of that instrument, then his conclusions are correct and we are liable to his criticisms. That great struggle, as I understand it and as the world understands it, was in regard to the construction of the Constitution, and when force of arms brought about a result, when the arbitrament of battle decided against the Southern people, there has never been with any honorable man since but one single question, and that was whether the South accepted honestly that result and intended to abide by it.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator allow me a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator believe that the constitutional construction for which the South contended was right or wrong?

Mr. VEST. I believed at the time it was right.

Mr. INGALLS. Well, but now?

Mr. VEST. I believed that it was right, but I accepted the result, and I accepted that result to be that I was honestly to abide by the construction of the Constitution of the United States put upon it by the Supreme Court, the highest judicial tribunal in this country, and made the arbiter as to what the meaning of the Constitution was.

I did not accept as the result of that struggle all the constructions put upon the Constitution by the Republican party or by the Senator from Kansas. I deny that the war put me in a position where I was bound to take for all time to come what he or his associates might say this instrument meant. Sir, if I came to the Senate representing a sovereign State in this Union under the proscription which the Senator from Kansas has announced here to-day, my State might as well, for all intents and purposes, be out of the Union with the rights and guarantees of the Constitution nullified as to it and its people. I am here, as I understand my obligation, to obey the Constitution of the United States as the result of the war, and not to take the construction put upon it by the Senator from Kansas.

No question can come into the Senate, from the highest to the lowest, but what the Senator from Kansas invokes the war, and he brings it here now as a means of constitutional construction. He tells us that this portion of the bill which I have before me is not intended for revenue purposes, but is intended to legislate out of existence these unlawful combinations and trusts. If that is so, why is a license issued to them? Why are they given the right under the authority of the United States to continue their unlawful and wicked machinations and evils?

Mr. INGALLS. They will not continue, if this proposed law goes into effect.

Mr. VEST. I shall propose an amendment to this portion of the bill. I shall propose to strike out the words "one thousand dollars" wherever they occur and to insert "ten thousand dollars." If the object of the bill is to make these combinations impossible, if it is to use the taxing power to tax them out of existence, why put upon those immense and wealthy combinations the paltry tax of $1,000 in order to allow them to continue their nefarious business?

Mr. President, my only object in rising was to move that in section 10 wherever the words "one thousand dollars" occur they be stricken out and there be inserted the words "ten thousand dollars."

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas would have us understand that we know nothing about the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. INGALLS. I beg pardon, Mr. President.

Mr. EUSTIS. I say the Senator from Kansas would intimate that we are not able to understand the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. INGALLS. Oh, no; not exactly. You have been on both sides of it; you ought to understand it.

Mr. EUSTIS. Therefore I will limit my endeavor to the understanding of this bill. I ask the Senator from Kansas, suppose I agree to sell a thousand bales of cotton to A, deliverable on the 1st of May. I make that contract to-day. Suppose that on the morning of the 1st of May the purchaser A actually gets the thousand bales of cotton, that I actually deliver the thousand bales of cotton, is that a future contract under this proposed law which is to be suppressed?

Mr. INGALLS. Not if I correctly understand the statement of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. EUSTIS. I will repeat it so that there can be no misunderstanding.

Mr. INGALLS. And I will go further and say that if a contract based upon the actual delivery of property that is in the possession of the person agreeing to sell is covered by this bill, it ought not to be. I am entirely candid about it.

Mr. EUSTIS. That does not answer my question. My question is this, if the Senator will give me his attention—

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, I am attending.

Mr. EUSTIS. Suppose that to-day I make a contract selling a thousand bales of cotton to A, deliverable on the 1st of May.

Mr. INGALLS. Which cotton you do not now possess?

Mr. EUSTIS. Yes. On the 1st of May I get that cotton and deliver it. I ask whether in the contemplation of this proposed law that is a future contract to be suppressed.

Mr. INGALLS. If on the 1st of May the contracting party has the cotton actually in his possession and delivers it, the transaction ought not to be obnoxious to the provisions of the bill.

Mr. EUSTIS. Then I understand that if I do not own it at the date of the contract, but I do at the date of the execution of the contract, it is not amenable to this bill?

Mr. INGALLS. It ought not to be.

Mr. EUSTIS. It ought not to be! I assume that the Senator knows what amendment he has offered to the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. It is not intended to be.

Mr. EUSTIS. Section 7 covers exactly the case which I stated, because it requires that the person shall own the property at the date of the contract. It provides:

That for the purposes of this act the word "futures" shall be understood to mean any contract or agreement whereby a party agrees to sell and deliver at a future time to another any of the articles mentioned in section 8 of this act when at the time of making such contract or agreement the party so agreeing to make such delivery, or the party for whom he acts as agent, broker, or employé in making such contract or agreement, is not at the time of making the same the owner of the article so contracted and agreed to be delivered.

So this amendment does prohibit and suppress the making of a contract for future delivery unless the party making the contract is the actual owner of the thing sold and to be delivered.

Mr. President, as I said, if you have a right to apply this to wheat and to cotton, of course there is no limitation to your power. How would the Senator from Massachusetts like to have inserted in the bill a provision that contracts for future delivery under the provisions of the bill shall include cotton prints, of which there are ten or twenty millions of dollars' worth made every year in the city of Boston. I understand in fact that nearly 90 per cent. of the cotton prints manufactured in this country are sold under future contracts. Yet here we have a proposition before Congress that under the pretense of the taxing power—I will recall that expression; it is not under the pretense of the taxing power, because the bill itself says that it is for the purpose of suppressing and preventing these contracts—the Congress of the United States is called upon to regulate these private contracts and dealings between individuals.

To-day we are acting with regard to contracts for future delivery because these contracts are considered obnoxious and objectionable. Admitting that they are, where are we to stop? If the taxing power has no limit and if we believe that the taxing power should not be exercised to absolutely control the police power of the States, we incur the criticism of the Senator from Kansas and are to admit that we are to stand here in disgrace.

My friend from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR], whose views of the Constitution are as broad as the ocean and as high as the blue heavens, felt it his duty to offer a constitutional amendment to change the Constitution in order to regulate the question of marriage contracts. The Senator from Kansas has discovered a new way of dealing with questions of contract. It is not necessary to amend the Constitution of the United States to deal with any civil contract, either the making of the contract or the dissolving of the contract, or the regulation of any of its civil consequences whatever. You are not called upon any longer to amend the Constitution of the United States when the power of Congress is to be invoked to regulate a contract between A and B in the State of Louisiana, when a Congressional law is to determine how that contract is to be performed, what shall be the consideration of that contract, when that contract shall be dissolved, because we have this new light which has been shed to-day coming from the State of Kansas, which informs us that under the taxing power every detail of the police power can be absolutely controlled by the Congress of the United States, every law that every State has can be abolished, every provision existing in every State constitution can be expunged, not an iota of State authority, or State law, or State constitution can ever have any operation in this country because, forsooth, under the taxing power the Congress of the United States can regulate any contract that is made between individuals in any State! Because we doubt the correctness of that doctrine, because we do not bow in humble submission to that mandate, because we do not worship such authority as that which tells us that he is able to revolutionize this Government, that he has made a discovery by which every vestige of State right, statehood, State sovereignty can be expunged, we are, forsooth, to be chided, and this hall is to resound with the amplified phraseology and the grandiloquent declamation for which the Senator from Kansas is so pre-eminently distinguished.

Yet, Mr. President, when I come to the practical question of asking him what does he mean by his bill, I absolutely demonstrate that he does not know what it means, and that he thought it meant directly contrary to what it does mean. I say that the bill does provide that, if any man in Kansas, in Massachusetts, or in Louisiana makes a contract with another man for the delivery of cotton, or wheat, or cotton print goods (that will come afterwards, not in this bill), at the time he makes that contract he must be the owner of the property which he sells and which he proposes to deliver. The Senator from Kansas did not know that that was in the amendment. He thought it was just the opposite. I wish to inform him that whenever the Congress of the United States undertakes to legislate in that direction, whether it be unconstitutional or constitutional, it will be a sorry day for the citizens of Kansas as well as the citizens of Louisiana. The people of the States have not been accustomed to come to Washington to ask the privilege of anybody of a license from Congress as to what contracts they shall and what contracts they shall not make.

Talk of centralization, talk of the Blair bill, talk of the oleomargarine bill! Why, Mr. President, any comparison to this bill of those bills might be considered under the shelter and shield of the Constitution of the United States. No such gap has ever before been attempted as is attempted by this bill, no such stride has been made in the direction of centralization, absolutism, tyranny, as has been made by this bill as amended to regulate the private contracts of individuals in the States. I wish for one, Mr. President, to declare to the Senator from Kansas that the State of Louisiana is able to manage that detail of human affairs without any assistance from him or from any other Senator. We are able in the State of Louisiana to regulate contracts with regard to property, contracts with regard to money. We are able to regulate our own marriage contracts, to regulate our own succession. And we are not willing and not ready yet to surrender our police power to Congress.

If the people of Kansas dislike contracts in futures, if they think they are obnoxious and odious, if they think these contracts are injurious to morals and against public policy, let them appeal to the Legislature of the State of Kansas to remove that evil, if it exists; and if this blow is aimed at Chicago—that city which has stolen the world's fair from New York and Washington, I will not say under false pretenses, for I believe they are incapable of resorting to such means—Chicago, which is said to be the great center of gambling in wheat, and corn, and barley, and oats, and bacon, and cattle—if the Senator from Kansas seeks to correct the morals of the State of Illinois, that overlooks his border, and is ashamed of that people because they countenance that species of gambling, if he is to assume the rôle of censor morum, instructor of the youth, guardian of public morals, the archangel that looks down and weeps for the depravity of his fellows living in the State of Illinois, I ask him, in the name of Heaven, to leave out Louisiana, and let us, if we choose, engage in future contracts.

Mr. INGALLS. We may need to take hold of your lottery by and by.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Kansas purely for information, for I had not supposed the bill went quite to the extent now alleged. The cotton manufactured in New England is nearly all of it purchased from brokers or farmers and institutions at the South, prior to its growth oftentimes, and nearly always before it is in the possession of the parties with whom the corporations, the mill-owners at the North, make their contracts for future delivery. So, then, the manufacture of cotton in New England is based upon contracts for the future delivery of cotton which is not in the possession of the other contracting party at the time the contract is made. I should like to know if the Senator means or understands this amendment of his to render illegal that practice, the regular business practice between New England and the South, between the manufacturers at the North and the cotton producers and middle-men at the South?

Mr. INGALLS. It is not aimed at any legitimate business. It is aimed at gambling in agricultural products, dealings between men who own none of the products they purport to sell and buy, and only intend to settle up the margin between the price at the time when they are to adjust their differences and the market price.

Mr. BLAIR. Should not the Senator, then, amend the second section of his amendment by inserting language tantamount to that which he has just used on the floor of the Senate, which is a declaration of the true intention; for certainly the second section as it now reads and the third section, which includes cotton, would absolutely destroy the existing basis of the cotton-manufacturing business in New England, and also, I doubt not, of the woolen manufacture, because the system of purchase and collection of cotton and of wool is precisely the same as that which I have stated. The manufacturing business is based upon contracts which are agreed upon as matters of certainty, frequently made long before the planting or the growing of the cotton, so that it is impossible that the cotton can be at the time of the contract in the possession of the party who contracts to deliver it in the future, and of course, however anxious a man might be to do something for the "blessed people" and get their votes, never could any New England man vote for the bill in that form. The language of the second section is very different from the explanation of what the Senator meant to do, as given by the Senator from Kansas. I will read it, so that there can be no doubt that he certainly will have this language called to his attention:

That for the purposes of this act the word "futures" shall be understood to mean any contract or agreement whereby a party agrees to sell and deliver at a future time to another any of the articles mentioned in section 3 of this act when at the time of making such contract or agreement the party so agreeing to make such delivery, or the party for whom he acts as agent, broker, or employé in making such contract or agreement, is not at the time of making the same the owner of the article so contracted and agreed to be delivered.

Now, the Senator's explanation of what he means to do if it should be embodied in an amendment to this section would exclude the legitimate business of the country in the cotton manufacture and the woolen manufacture from the operation of the bill, but, as it now is, the cotton business has got to stop in New England. A Senator asks, "How about corn?" That is a Kansas affair. I am not so much interested in corn and wheat personally. The election in New Hampshire does not turn on the corn and wheat business [laughter], but if we get by the ears on the cotton business I remind my colleagues and I remind the Senator from Massachusetts that here is something to look after. The election comes off next November in New Hampshire. [Laughter.]

Now, the third section of the amendment as offered runs in this way:

That the articles to which the foregoing sections relate are wheat, corn, oats, rye, barley, cotton.

I live in a city that manufactures more cotton, at least that has one corporation that does a larger business in that line, than any other corporation on the face of the earth. If I voted for a bill like this, what could I do? Manchester would go against us by a four-fifths majority, and we have hard work to hold her as it is. [Laughter.] The Democrats are getting ahead rapidly. To pass a bill like this loses us the next House of Representatives inevitably. [Laughter.] I fear the Senator is only calculating with reference to the result in Kansas that grows so much corn, oats, rye, barley, and some wheat. If the Senator would insert here something to the effect that the business of Manchester should not be affected by the operations of this bill, I might, perhaps, consider whether I could not vote for it, because I am exceedingly anxious to be understood to be a particular friend of the people. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for a vote on the pending amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President—

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the pending amendment disposed of.

Mr. BUTLER. I merely want to ask the Senator from Kansas a question.

Mr. INGALLS. I would say to the Senator from South Carolina that my amendment is not pending now.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that, but I wanted to put a question. The phraseology of the bill, it seems to me, is a little confusing. However, I will wait until this vote is taken.

Mr. INGALLS. I will hear the Senator.

Mr. BUTLER. I observe that reference is made to articles specified in section 3 of the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. That has been changed. That was an error of the clerk in the enumeration. The numbering of the sections has been changed. That amendment has been made.

Mr. BUTLER. To what section does that refer?

Mr. INGALLS. Section 8. Quite a large number of these amendments were made this morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. My attention was diverted for a moment. I should like to know what amendment that was.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]; it has been so long pending that we have forgotten all about it.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me ask a question. Does the Senator from Ohio expect to have a vote on the bill this evening?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do. I hope for mercy's sake we shall finish it.

Mr. GEORGE. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin was so long that I could not understand it by the reading of it at the desk, and I was going to say that if the Senator from Ohio did not expect to have a vote this evening I should like to have the amendment printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to having it printed, but I hope we shall have this bill closed to-night.

Mr. GEORGE. I will not make the request, then, if the Senator desires to proceed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the plain purpose and meaning of the Senator from Kansas and the meaning of section 7 is to prevent gambling contracts, to prohibit what is done in all the boards, especially where wheat and corn not in existence are sold in immense quantities, to prevent such contracts and I think the sentiment of every member of the Senate would be against such contracts. They are very injurious. They enable persons without any property whatever, and sometimes without any money, to combine and put up the price of corn, wheat, etc. I am more familiar with the combinations in regard to corn and wheat than to cotton, but I can see that the same rule applies to that great staple. The language I think is too strong in the seventh section, and I would suggest to the Senator from Kansas to add to it in describing the contracts words which will indicate that there was no intention on the part of either party to deliver the actual article.

I can imagine many cases where men could go into the market and buy wheat, expecting the wheat to be delivered and to be sold again to the miller or somebody else. There are transactions of that kind occurring constantly, and it certainly is not the desire or intention of the Senator from Kansas to interfere with that kind of a contract.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion at that point?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. Why would not this fix the matter? Insert after the word "same," in line 9, something like this, "or does not in good faith expect to be the owner thereof at the date fixed for the delivery of the same?"

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from Oregon repeat that, for it is impossible to hear him?

Mr. MITCHELL. In section 7, insert after the word "same," in line 9, the words "or does not in good faith expect to be the owner thereof at the date fixed for the delivery of the same."

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the words in the preceding section if carried into section 7 will cover the whole thing, that is to say, "the seller is not hereby obligated to deliver to another (that is the purchaser) at a future time or period any of the articles mentioned in the contract."

Mr. MITCHELL. A man may have a thousand acres of land sown in wheat; it may be growing, and if at any time before that wheat ripens or is harvested he makes a contract, based on the expectation that he is going to have a crop, to deliver a thousand bushels of wheat on the 1st day of October to A, that is declared an unlawful contract by this section plainly. Now, I want that amended.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not care what words are used, but it is one of those cases certainly where words ought to be found to define exactly the difference between a gambling contract and a contract made by a broker.

Mr. BLAIR. The dictionary is right over in the corner. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLISON. I had made a note of an amendment to the section covering the suggestions made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], and that is, to add after the word "owner," in line 9, the words "or producer."

Mr. GORMAN. Where is that?

Mr. ALLISON. On page 5, section 7, line 9; so as to read:

Is not at the time of making the same the owner or producer of the articles so contracted and agreed to be delivered.

There is a very common practice in every agricultural State of the Union to contract for farm products in advance of their actual existence. That is the case referred to by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] and as indicated by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS], I take it, in respect to cotton. A cotton producer in one of the States makes some arrangements with what is called a factor in New Orleans to secure advances on his crop and agrees to sell him that crop, I suppose, at the market price at the time of the delivery. Certainly, there should be no law to prevent a transaction of that character.

Mr. BLAIR. That factor is the same that the New England corporation or manufacturer contracts with and they make their contracts as early as, or earlier than, the factor contracts with the producer. Now, unless this language enables the manufacturers of New England to contract seasonably with this factor, not the producer, but the factor, the man who gathers in from the producer and who relies upon his contract with the producer as the basis for his contract with the manufacturer, unless the language reaches the New Englander, you see my difficulty. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLISON. I see the difficulty under which the Senator from New Hampshire labors, and I think that if under the conditions I have named a New England manufacturer, under the provisions of this bill with the words which I suggest added, were to contract with a factor or agent in New Orleans, if that agent at the time was an agent of the producer, and not otherwise, for the future delivery of cotton, it would be entirely proper.

Mr. BLAIR. But the factor is not necessarily the agent of the producer, and he often is not so. He makes his contract with the New Englander a long time before he has begun to gather in from the producer.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask if there is any amendment now pending?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is not.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I move—because whatever else should be added to this section, I am clear that the words I suggest should be added—

Mr. MITCHELL. The word "producer" would cover the case I stated.

Mr. ALLISON. That is exactly what I want to do. In line 9 of section 7, on page 5, after the word "owner," I move to insert the words "or producer."

Mr. GRAY. I ask the Senator from Iowa, understanding as I think I do the object he has in view in his amendment, whether he thinks that the two words "or producer" will effectuate that object, for this reason: The language employed in the section is "is not at the time of making the same the owner or producer of the article"—that is, at the time of making the contract. The corn or cotton is to grow hereafter and is not in existence, and he can not be said in any proper sense to be the producer of that which is not yet produced; and so I suggest that the Senator had better add, in addition to the words "or producer," the words "at the time of making the same the owner, or, unless he expects to be in good faith, the producer," or some equivalent language.

Mr. ALLISON. I see the difficulty in using precise phraseology that will cover the condition of a growing field of corn or wheat; but I can conceive of no better word to use than the word "producer." In the State in which I live it is the practice for farmers in some portions of our State to contract for what would be called seed wheat or seed flax, if you please, or the seed they put into the ground, and they agree with the person who furnishes them the seed to sell the product of that seed to him at the market price within a given time. I have no doubt that is substantially what is done in the matter of cotton. The cotton producer—and he is the producer in the language of this section as I propose to amend it—agrees to sell to the agent or factor or purchaser the product of his crop at the end of the season, or at a time which may be agreed upon, or which may be indefinite.

So I think the language I have employed here will cover that situation. It will not cover, however, the situation where a broker in New Orleans steps out upon 'change and sells 10,000 bales of cotton, to be delivered at a future time, without having a bale of cotton or the expectation or hope of having a bale, but is selling that cotton with a view of purchasing it, if necessary, to make the delivery on the 1st of May, or whatever the time may be, as the Senator from Louisiana said. This bill, I agree, does not cover that situation. Not only does it not cover it, but I think the language employed here is intended to prohibit it, and it does seem to me that it will be difficult to frame language here that will cover the entire situation and will break up this gambling in futures without breaking up the power of any man to sell that which he does not have or to buy that which he does not expect to receive.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Why would it not do to insert after the word "deliver," in line 10, the words "or does not at the time of such contract intend in good faith to deliver?"

Mr. MITCHELL. That is substantially what I suggested a few moments ago.

Mr. HOAR. It is a little different in phraseology, but it is in substance the Senator's idea. That, of course, puts upon the Government, if you are undertaking to indict, the onus of proving the intent; but that runs through all the great class of crimes. You know you have to prove the illegal intent and the surroundings and circumstances in general.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I do not object to the language suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, but I submit that after this measure becomes a law with that language inserted every man who makes a contract to deliver an article in the future will have it inserted in the contract that the sale is made for the purpose of delivery, because these provisions require that these contracts shall be in writing.

Now, then, the intent is an intent at the time that the contract is made. The man who makes that sale will have the intent to make the delivery at the time the sale is made, but it may happen that at the time of the delivery, which is a future time, it will not be possible for him to deliver the actual thing which he intended to deliver under that condition of selling, because occasions have arisen in Chicago and New York when it was physically impossible to deliver upon a given day the amount sold to be delivered on that day. So the man's intent will be, as the Senator from Massachusetts suggests it will be, an intent to deliver, but when the time comes it is impracticable to deliver, and then the two parties who make the contract will be compelled to make a new one or adjust their differences as they do now.

Mr. President, I want to say, as respects the modifications of this seventh section, that the complaint in the region of country in which I live is that this gambling in futures, this selling what people do not have to sell in quantities fifty times that which is in existence at the time, has a tendency to greatly depress the price of agricultural products. What our people want to do is to break up that habit, and that is the reason why they are in favor of some legislation such as is proposed by the Senator from Kansas; and I submit to the Senator from Louisiana that any serious modification of this provision which will enable the cotton brokers in New Orleans or in Chicago to do what he suggests they ought to be permitted to do, will have the effect of absolutely rendering nugatory the provisions of this bill as proposed by its author. Therefore it is that, if we are undertaking to deal with this question in the sense that the people who are opposed to these trusts want us to deal with it, we must, in essence at least, prohibit what the Senator from Louisiana says we ought not to prohibit.

I am not at this moment arguing whether or not the seventh section will do what the people who are opposed to these transactions think ought to be done; but I am very clear that the suggestions made by the Senator from Louisiana, if they are carried out, will make this seventh section absolutely a nugatory section.

Mr. BUTLER. May I suggest a practical question to the Senator from Iowa on the line of what he has just been saying? He states that it is a practice in Iowa and in the Western States, the agricultural States—and it certainly is the practice in my part of the country, where large crops of cotton are made—that the farmer or producer, whom it is intended by this bill to protect against gambling combinations, makes a contract with the factor, with the broker, the merchant, "If you will lend me $1,000, $2,000, or $5,000, I will agree to deliver in the fall, after the product is made, 1,000 bales of cotton, or 100 bales of cotton, or 5,000 bushels of wheat, or 2,000 bushels of corn," as the case may be. These articles are not then in esse. They are not in existence. They are necessarily intended for future delivery. The question I want to get at is, and it is a practical one, whether or not that factor or broker or merchant, or whatever you may please to call him, would not be compelled under this bill in making a contract of that kind to take out a license and pay the tax imposed.

Mr. ALLISON. Under this bill as I propose to amend it I do not understand that such a broker would be obliged to take out a license.

Mr. BUTLER. It seems to me, unless some such modification as that suggested by the Senator from Iowa is adopted, that a factor or merchant would be compelled to take out a license under the provisions of the bill before he could take an option or contract for the delivery of any farmer's crop in the West or South.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to suggest an amendment to the Senator from Iowa. A person making a sale of iron, of cotton, of cotton goods, or of woolen goods may not own a single dollar's worth, and may not be a producer thereof, and I suggest to the Senator to add, after the word "producer," the words "or the agent of such owner or producer."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that the amendment which he proposes is an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], which was agreed to in Committee of the Whole, and an amendment to that amendment is therefore not now in order except by unanimous consent. The amendment will be in order when the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. One word further. I want to say to the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Iowa that I am strongly in sympathy with the general line of this legislation if it can be properly enacted, but there is always a danger of going a little too far and interfering with matters which Congress, and nobody else, has any right to interfere with, unless it be the parties themselves. If the language of the bill can be so framed as to come within what I believe to be the constitutional powers of Congress, I shall be very glad to vote for it; but this practical difficulty suggests itself and it may lead to inextricable confusion and great injustice and wrong unless we are careful with the language of the bill. Let me read the section:

That for the purpose of preventing and suppressing, as far as may be, the dealing in options and futures as herein defined, special taxes are imposed as follows: Dealers in "options" or "futures"—

Merchants and factors are dealers in options or futures under the view that I have just presented—shall pay annually the sum of $1,000, and shall also pay the further sum of 5 cents per pound for each and every pound of cotton or of beef, pork, lard, or other hog and cattle products, and the sum of 20 cents per bushel for each and every bushel of any of the articles mentioned in section 3—of this act, the right or privilege of delivering which may be acquired under any "options" contract or agreement, as defined by section 1 of this act, or which may be sold to be delivered at a future time or period under any "futures" contract or agreement as defined in section 2 of this act, which said amounts shall be paid to the collector of internal revenue.

I submit that under a fair construction of that language the merchant in New York, or in Baltimore, or in any of the commercial centers of Iowa, or in Illinois, or the South will be compelled, before he can enter into a contract with a farmer, to take out this license and pay that $1,000 and so much per pound for every pound of cotton, pork, lard, etc., that he deals in. Well, what will be the practical effect of it?

It will be that that merchant will charge the license-tax to the farmer. The merchant is not going to pay it. He will say, "Congress has passed an act which requires me to take out a license and pay a tax of 5 cents on every pound of cotton. Now, I shall compel you to hold me harmless against that tax before I will make any agreement with you for advances on account of the delivery of your cotton;" and at last the very class of people whom this legislation is intended to protect become the victims of the factor, the merchant, the broker, or whatever you may choose to call him. It seems to me that is a fair construction of the clause. If it is not, I should be very glad to have it explained.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to have the attention of the Senator from Kansas a moment. All over the State of New York there are located depots for the collection of milk, extending 300 miles from the city of New York, in regard to which the collector from the farmer or the middleman makes his contract with the dealer in New York City to furnish him with so much milk per day, amounting, say, to not more than $50 a year in value. He makes the contract with the farmers in the neighborhood where his depot is located for them to furnish him with milk from day to day. Now, is there any doubt that such a middle-man would be compelled to take out a license?

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I will answer the suggestion of the Senator from New York by reading the amendment that I shall propose to this section, in order to exclude any such possible definition. I propose, in line 9 of section 7, after the word "owner," to insert "or producer, or the lawful agent of such owner or producer." At the end of the proviso, after the word "value," I propose to strike out the period and insert a comma, and add, "nor to bona fide contracts for the actual delivery of the property contracted for."

Mr. HOAR. That should come after the word "establishment."

Mr. INGALLS. After the amendment as amended on the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, whatever that may be.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator restate the last amendment?

Mr. INGALLS—

Nor to bona fide contracts for the actual delivery of the property contracted for.

Mr. BUTLER. Where does that come in?

Mr. INGALLS. At the end of section 7, after the last word in the present proviso, and I should like to have the Clerk read the section then as it will stand when amended as proposed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Section 7, line 9, after the word "owner," it is proposed to insert the words "or producer or the lawful agent of such owner or producer;" and after the amendment already agreed to at the end of the proviso, it is proposed to add the words "nor to bona fide contracts for the actual delivery of the property contracted for;" so as to read:

SEC. 7. That for the purposes of this act the word "futures" shall be understood to mean any contract or agreement whereby a party agrees to sell and deliver at a future time to another any of the articles mentioned in section 3 of this act when at the time of making such contract or agreement the party so agreeing to make such delivery, or the party for whom he acts as agent, broker, or employé in making such contract or agreement, is not at the time of making the same the owner or producer or the lawful agent of such owner or producer of the article so contracted and agreed to be delivered: Provided, That this act shall not apply to contracts for the delivery at any one time of articles of not more than $50 in value, or of articles to be consumed by the person to whom they are to be delivered or in his establishment, nor to bona fide contracts for the actual delivery of the property contracted for.

Mr. DOLPH. It appears to me that there might be an easier way of getting rid of the section than by the amendment proposed to the proviso by the Senator from Kansas.

The sixth section provides—

That for the purposes of this act the word "options" shall be understood to mean any contract or agreement whereby a party thereto, or any person, corporation, partnership, or association for whom or in whose behalf such contract or agreement is made acquires the right or privilege, but is not thereby obligated, to deliver to another at a future time or period any of the articles mentioned in section 3 of this act.

A man who makes a contract with regard to personal property is obligated to deliver the property. If he fails to deliver it he pays damages. There is no law to enforce the specific performance of a contract to deliver farm produce, so that there is no real practical difference between options and futures. The provision of this bill which is to be effective is contained in the seventh section, which prevents dealing in futures. Now, to say that it shall not apply to any one who makes a bona fide contract for the delivery of these articles, in the first place complicates the matter by bringing in the question of bona fides. The contract may be bona fide; it may be the intention of the party to make the delivery; he may expect to do it, and he may prove that he did make such a contract; but if he does not make the delivery all that can be done is to get damages against him and make him pay the difference between the price at the time of delivery, if it is greater than at the time of sale. That is all there is of it. Therefore, these words will make both sections entirely inoperative.

I suppose that the real intention of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas was to prevent dealing in options. That is what we are striking at. How are you going to distinguish between a gambling contract and a contract made in good faith? There is the same facility in gambling, in speculating in futures, in a contract which is made in good faith, as in a contract made without any intention of actual delivery of the article.

Now, in regard to the purchase of articles from the producer, if there is no prohibition against this, there is nothing to prevent forestalling the market by securing control of the farm products of the West. A purchaser may buy the entire wheat crop, and so determine and fix the price for the consumer; and I say that nothing would be gained by providing that a farmer may sell, if everybody has the right to buy, and to forestall the market.

Then, again, if you prevent the purchaser of the crop, at least where it is intended for exportation, from making a contract for the sale of the article before he has purchased it, unless he buys it for speculation in advance of the time of delivery, he will not buy it at all.

It appears to me that the bill, while it deals with the producer and with articles that are imported, omits to deal with articles which are purchased and combinations formed to advance the price of articles which are purchased for export.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment now proposed, being an amendment to the part of the bill inserted in Committee of the Whole, it may be received and reported by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 7, line 9, after the word "owner," it is proposed to insert:

Or producer or the lawful agent of such owner or producer.

And after the proviso in section 7 it is proposed to add:

Nor to bona fide contracts for the actual delivery of the property contracted for.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I hope the bill may be reported to the Senate. Mr. ALDRICH. I offer an amendment, which I think there will be no objection to, in section 1, after line 23.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 1 an additional proviso, as follows:

Provided further, That this act shall not be construed to apply to or to declare unlawful combinations or associations made with a view or which tend, by means other than by a reduction of the wages of labor, to lessen the cost of production or reduce the price of any of the necessities of life, nor to the combinations or associations made with a view or which tend to increase the earnings of persons engaged in any useful employment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to add, after the word "products," in line 4, at the end of section 8, the words "and also stocks and bonds."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection to receiving the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina, it will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 8 it is proposed to add "and also stocks and bonds;" so as to read:

SEC. 8. That the articles to which the foregoing sections relate are wheat, corn, oats, rye, barley, cotton, and all other farm products; also beef, pork, lard, and all other hog and cattle products; and also stocks and bonds.

Mr. REAGAN. Why, Mr. President, more harm is done by dealing in stocks and bonds than in nearly all other things put together. If we are going to adopt that amendment, we had better say the bill shall not apply to anything.

Mr. BUTLER. I was in hopes my friend would favor my amendment. If harm results from gambling in stocks and bonds, it is exactly what I want to get at. I want to suppress that evil as well as others. It is perfectly germane to the bill, and I think there is more gambling in stocks and bonds than in oats, rye, barley, cotton, and other things.

Mr. REAGAN. I must have misunderstood the portion of the bill to which the Senator proposed his amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. It is to be added to the articles named in section 8. The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EUSTIS. I move to add "cotton prints, steel rails, salt, boots and shoes, lumber, and lead," and anything else I can think of. [Laughter.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 8 it is proposed to add:

Also cotton prints, steel rails, salt, boots and shoes, lumber, and lead.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the Senator will not put in "lumber." I understood him to say "rubber." I would rather it would go in "rubber."

Mr. BLAIR. You did not hear right.

Mr. INGALLS. I forgot to ask the Senator from South Carolina when his amendment was pending whether stocks and bonds were to be taxed by the pound or by the bushel. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. I think by the bushel, Mr. President, or the ton, if the Senator would prefer it. [Laughter.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I move to add "whisky and all manner of intoxicating drinks."

Mr. SHERMAN. This would be very funny if the hour was not so late, but I hope we may be able to pass this bill in half an hour or so; and as all these amendments have to be reported to the Senate, I ask Senators to let the bill be reported with the pending amendments, and then, of course, we can have a vote on these various propositions.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire be reported.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish the amendment to read in this way:

Woolen goods, also whisky and all kinds of intoxicating liquors.

I mention whisky because I know that some of the Senators would understand what the rest of the amendment meant. [Laughter.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 8:

Also woolen goods, whisky, and all manner of intoxicating drinks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I have not taken any part in the consideration of this measure except to give my votes very cheerfully in favor of the bill, which I think the entire country has been looking forward to the passage of in some shape that would correct the great evil which has been complained of, and properly complained of.

When the motion was made yesterday to refer this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary I voted against that proposition, hoping and believing that the bill would be so phrased and shaped that some practical good would come of the effort of the Senator from Ohio and those in charge of the bill. It is very evident, however, from what occurred late yesterday and from what has occurred to day that we have so amended the present proposition as to make it inoperative and ineffectual. It will be worse than a sham and a delusion.

Being heartily in favor of the general proposition and with a desire to accomplish something for the people of this country, who have complained long of the evil which we are seeking to deal with, I now move that this measure be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] that that committee be requested to report the measure within twenty days; and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN. About that I have something to say. I give notice to the Senate that there are features of this bill that I do not intend shall be defeated by indirection and by the mode which has been adopted here within the last hour. I give fair notice, so far as I am concerned, that this bill shall have fair play, I do not care who opposes it.

Mr. President, the amendments which have been put upon this bill in the last few minutes are such as simply bring it into contempt, and the manner in which this has been done tends to bring the whole bill into contempt. But the bill is worth preserving. There are three propositions in the bill, one the original bill amended, and I think very much strengthened and a better bill than it was at first, because it is a better bill than probably the committee would report. The first two or three or four sections of the bill there can be now no reasonable objection to. Most of the difficulties have been overcome. The proposition made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is also in the right direction, and, after careful consideration of that proposition, there can be no objection to it so far as any one who is in favor of the principle of the bill is concerned. It adds a criminal clause and defines somewhat the meaning of words in the original bill. So far so good.

The attempt now to belittle the proposition of the Senator from Kansas seems to me an attempt to destroy and defeat this bill. I am to old a stager here not to understand the meaning of these various amendments. I know it perfectly well. But I say now that, for one, I do not care how long it takes, I do not propose that this bill shall be defeated in that way without at least a pretty fair chance to vote upon it.

There is some question as to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas. Although it is wise in its purpose and in the main its provisions are wise, yet, as it has not been considered by a committee, it may very well possibly be postponed and be treated of in another and separate measure.

The fact that gambling contracts, made under the names given by brokers as "options" and "futures," are illegal contracts which tend to depreciate the value of agricultural products and tend to do a great deal of injury to the country is admitted on all hands. The men engaged in them know that they are unlawful. They are conducted in immense amounts.

I do not think that the sixth and seventh sections of the bill are framed with sufficient caution to prevent interference with ordinary legal and proper contracts between parties. It seems to me it would be very wise to mark out the line between a regular business transaction and a gambling contract where neither party contemplates the delivery of the article, where it is a mere bet on the value of the article. These bets tend to depreciate the value of agricultural products of the country at the time when they are offered for sale and tend to advance the price of articles at the time when men want to realize on their bets, their puts, and futures, and options.

I hope the Senator from Kansas will allow us to take a vote. This bill must be reported to the Senate. There are two propositions in it of great importance. The amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], which is now a distinct and separate amendment, and the vote upon that amendment will carry with it the amendments which have been made, and so with the proposition offered by the Senator from Kansas. As a matter of course, if that amendment is agreed to, it should be stripped of the various amendments which have been proposed here in humor and joke, or if it should be disagreed to—because it is not now in a fit condition to be made a part of this bill—it might be disagreed to by a single vote.

But I appeal to the Senate, now that we have this question of trusts and combinations before us, now that we have got a reasonable definition of trusts so as to meet the opinion of all Senators, when we have the machinery of law to carry the bill into effect and we have the additional sanction of a criminal provision to it, that we ought not to allow this bill to be defeated under these circumstances. If we do, the people of the United States will feel that the Senate of the United States is playing with a question which affects nearly and dearly the vital interests of our country.

That is all I have to say. I intend, so far as I can, to try to strip this bill of anything that is objectionable to a majority of the Senate and then to pass what there is of virtual good in it.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, so far as the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio about the abandonment of my amendment is concerned, I beg leave to say to him, with great deference and profound respect, that my amendment is the best thing there is about his bill. It is the only substantial proposition that offers definite, palpable, and tangible relief against what is acknowledged to be one of the gigantic evils of this century. This criticism and censure is idle and frivolous. There is not a man in this country who will read these proceedings to-morrow morning, if this provision is defeated, who will not know what it means. There is no farmer so remote or so obscure that he will not understand what these various amendments that have been offered mean. Nobody will be deluded by them. This is not the first time, Mr. President, that Nero has fiddled while Rome has burned.

The nefarious operations that this amendment is aimed at have done more to paralyze industry, to reduce prices, to bring about the condition of affairs that exists to-day than all other influences combined. The penalties against them are not half severe enough in this bill. Instead of being fined and imprisoned their perpetrators ought to be hanged. It was the nefarious corners that were operated in Chicago and elsewhere up to the year 1892 that broke the price of wheat in the market, by gambling operations in products which did not exist and were known not to exist, that have destroyed the supremacy of the American wheat-grower on the Continent. It was those operations that forced foreign consumers to fill the demand for the deficit on account of their failing crops at those enormous prices which induced Great Britain in the last year or two to make enormous appropriations for extending her railroad system into the great wheat-growing regions of India, at the base of the Himalaya Mountains, where labor is 10 cents a day, with which American labor can never compete.

If the price of wheat and other agricultural products had been left to the natural laws of demand and supply, if artificial scarcity had not been produced, if inordinate prices had not been brought about by the operations against which this amendment has been aimed, we should not hear of the desolation and blight that to-day has fallen upon the agriculture of America.

Sir, although the farmers of this country have been sneered at to-day, although we have heard disparaging allusions to the Farmers' Alliances and associations, and suggestions that this legislation was being brought about at their dictation, they are intelligent, they know what the purpose of this amendment is, they know the cause of the evils under which they labor and of which they complain. There is no one thing which they have more imperatively and more unanimously demanded than the enactment of some law which will put a stop to the gambling in the products of their labor.

Mr. President, I have discharged my duty. I have, according to the light that was in me, with the limited time at my disposal, with the short period for examination that I could command, offered this amendment for the purpose of curing those evils which all admit, which all deplore, and of which all complain.

I ask that the bill may be reported to the Senate, and I shall demand a yea-and-nay vote in the Senate upon agreeing to these amendments that have been humorously inserted while the bill has been in Committee of the Whole. I know that sometimes the Senate has to unbend itself; the bow can not be always stretched. These amendments, I am confident, have been put on in a spirit of jocularity and recreation and refreshment. There has been a little time of recreation from labor. I feel confident that when the bill is reported to the Senate and such amendments are reserved they will, upon a yea-and-nay vote, be voted down.

Although I am a member of the Committee on the Judiciary and ought to have risen and protested against the exquisite humor and badinage of the speech of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] yesterday, and although a similar matter has been referred to that committee, I venture to express the hope that after having had four days of debate, four days deliberated and matured, with the light at last dawning, some progress made, something done, we are not to be told that all this is to go for naught, and that the bill is to be committed for further incubation to the Committee on the Judiciary. I ask that that motion may not prevail, and give notice that when the bill is reported to the Senate I shall ask for a yea-and-nay vote upon concurring in the amendments that were made, beginning with that of the Senator from South Carolina and proceeding to those subsequently offered by other Senators.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President—

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Vermont permit me to say just one word?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will let me say a word for a single moment.

Mr. VEST. With the greatest pleasure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Chair has recognized me. I merely wish to mention confidentially here, as it is perhaps out of order, that the chairman of the subcommittee on the bill introduced upon this subject by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] on the 4th of December is my honorable friend from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], who has had the matter in charge.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator from Vermont vouchsafe the information what that has to do with this subject?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, I have not any information to give, only my friend from Kansas stated that the matter had been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill of the Senator from Texas, and it having been so referred, the chairman of that committee, according to its course (if I may speak a little out of order), put it into the hands of three gentlemen of the highest experience and capacity, of whom the chief was my honorable friend from Kansas; and the reason why the Committee on the Judiciary have not before reported is simply owing to the fact I stated the other day, that executive matters had apparently taken up all our time.

Mr. INGALLS. Very well. The Senator from Vermont made that remark yesterday afternoon, that the reason why the committee had not reported was because duties in connection with executive business had prevented it. He now rises and remarks in violation of order, as he himself admits, that it was referred to a subcommittee of which I am chairman. If that observation is intended to be offensive or incalculatory, I resent it. If it is not, I pass it by.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I want to adopt that language in regard to the remark of the Senator from Kansas. I alluded here this afternoon in a pleasant way, and in replying to the Senator from North Carolina, who had taunted the committee of which I was a member with dilatory action and indifference towards the great agricultural interests of this country, that the Farmers' Alliance was prescribing to certain gentlemen here, and they were unwilling to make any discrimination, and now the Senator from Kansas makes me the point—

Mr. INGALLS. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. VEST. To his declaration here by saying—

Mr. INGALLS. I have not referred to the Senator, directly or indirectly.

Mr. VEST. I was the Senator, and the only one, who alluded to the Farmers' Alliance, and he says now that the Farmers' Alliance has been alluded to in disparaging terms upon this floor and in a sneering allusion. I resent it.

Mr. President, I have no objection to the Senator's declamatory eloquence. I have no objection to listening here to his rounded periods. We all know that he would sacrifice anything, from the Constitution down, to round a period or to point an epigram; but I most distinctly protest against his using me as an object upon which to electrify the country, and especially the farmers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I should not have alluded to this matter at all except that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] yesterday, when I was not able to be present, as I saw from the RECORD to-day, had spoken of the Committee on the Judiciary as the tomb to which all things Senators wished to dodge were sent. If that be so, it is because the Senate wished to dodge something. But I desire to tell the Senator from North Carolina and the Senate and the country, if that is what we are for (and I rather suppose from what has taken place here for a few days that it is what we are for), that the Committee on the Judiciary has never failed, so far as I know, since I have been a member of it, to report any measure that any Senator had sent to it that that Senator desired to have reported; and the only instance I know of when we were complained of was some years ago when a Senator complained that a measure of his had not been reported upon either way, and he was told on the floor of the Senate by the chairman of the committee that it should be reported within six days or five days or a very short time if he wanted it; and all the members of his party immediately afterwards, in the committee, and himself, asked that the committee should not report it, notwithstanding the complaint that the committee had not reported it, and so it was not reported.

I should not have referred to this matter at all if the Senator from Kansas, to whom I meant no offense of course, had not alluded to the fact that the substance of this measure, the best arrangement that had been proposed, in the first instance, that I know of, the bill of the Senator from Texas, was referred to that committee and had not been reported. That seemed to imply a reproach upon the committee, a neglect of public interests. Therefore I did take my life in my hand and did state, out of order, that if there was any fault, as there was not, if there was any fault in the committee, as there was not, because matters that were immediately pressing had to be attended to, it was not the fault of the whole body of the committee, but of the gentlemen to whom that committee had committed the consideration of this special thing, of whom my honorable and distinguished friend from Kansas was the chairman. I did not certainly mean to give any offense and had not the slightest thought of doing so; but it is right to fairness here to understand just how the thing is.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I do not think it is altogether fair to those of us who have not been within the charmed circle of the Judiciary Committee or the Committee on Finance to be told, as we have been by one Senator on one hand and another on another, that this bill must go through volens volens, and that there will be no trifling with it, when they themselves admit, the Senator from Ohio himself admits, that there is some doubt about the constitutionality or form of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, and therefore there ought to be some modifications in that; whereupon the Senator from Kansas rises with great indignation and assures the Senator from Ohio that his amendment is all there is in the bill that is worth anything.

Now, I want to say for one that my sympathies are with this bill. I should be very glad indeed to vote for it. But I have a little more respect for the Constitution than the Senator from Kansas appears to have, and I must be allowed to consult my own conscience and my own judgment as to what I think is constitutional and what is unconstitutional. If this bill can be put in such shape as to relieve it from the difficulties which have been suggested, I shall be most happy to vote for it. The Senator from Ohio says that he scarcely recognizes his own bill as it came from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. President, I think that this question will stand a little further delay. It is a very important one, involving very complicated questions, so admitted by all parties, by the most distinguished lawyers of this body and by the laymen of the body. It has been discussed for four days, and the more we discuss it the more those complications and difficulties appear to increase. I want to vote for the bill. I want to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Kansas if I can. The amendments I offered were not offered for the purpose of depreciating the measure or in any spirit of humor or jocularity, as he says; but I was in earnest, and it so happened that the last amendment I suggested was adopted by his motion.

So there can be no proper charge of an attempt to ridicule or bring contempt upon the bill so far as I am concerned. I know the evils are very great which the bill is designed to correct. I know the Farmers' Alliance is a very large, a very distinguished, a very influential body in this country, and I think furthermore that a good deal of the dissatisfaction that has arisen has been the result of demagogism—that is my judgment—deliberate demagogism, in pandering to all sorts of suggestions from everywhere, and the Senate is supposed to yield to outside clamor before we can arrive at a sensible conclusion upon any subject.

So far as I am concerned I propose to be governed by what I believe is proper, right, legal, and constitutional, and I shall vote for nothing else. I believe that we can get a bill under that provision of the Constitution which gives Congress the power to regulate commerce; and perhaps under that power which the Senator from Kansas invokes to sustain his amendment, the taxing power, we might do it.

But this measure as it now stands is in such a crude condition that I do not think anybody here, not even the authors of the bill or the amendments, can vote for it intelligently, and yet they object to its going to a committee where it can be formulated, improved, and corrected. I have no preference about its going to the Committee on the Judiciary, but it seems to me that out of respect to the differences of opinion which exist here it ought to be recommitted to the Committee on Finance, who can improve and perfect it in accordance with the suggestions that have been made here.

Mr. SHERMAN. We can finish it in half an hour by reporting it to the Senate and taking a vote by yeas and nays upon every proposition.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator says we can finish it in half an hour. Possibly it might not be finished in such a way that everybody could vote for it who would like to vote for it.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, from the discussion which has occurred since my motion to commit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary was made, and the motion was only made for the purpose of perfecting the bill, as the Senator from Ohio who has charge of it insists upon going on with it in its present shape and letting it be reported to the Senate, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. INGALLS, and others. Let the bill be reported to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Are there further amendments to the bill as in Committee of the Whole? If not, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I can not vote for the bill in its present shape. Notwithstanding the lecture which the Senator from Kansas gave us upon our duty in regard to questions of constitutional law, I still conceive it to have been the intention of those who sent us here that we should exercise the powers conferred by the Constitution on the legislative department of the Government, and not attempt to exercise those which were not conferred.

It is not necessary for me at this time, after the exhaustive arguments which have been made by the Senator from Mississippi, and the Senator from Texas, and others upon the bill, and which have demonstrated the features in which it is obnoxious to the Constitution and where it is without constitutional warrant, to detain the Senate by any remarks of my own upon that head.

I should be very glad if there were some way by which the evils aimed at, which all acknowledge, could be met and could be effectually remedied. I should be glad to see that done in regard to many of those contrivances which have resulted in the advance of our civilization and the increase of our wealth, by which combinations of capital have been enabled to secure to themselves undue advantages over those who were not the possessors of capital in the same degree. But, sir, I am compelled to recognize the fact that there are many things desirable to be accomplished in the abstract or in the concrete which the Government of the United States as a Government of limited and special powers is not competent to accomplish. I do not think it wise statesmanship that we should burn the house in order to get rid of the rats, nor that we should overthrow our constitutional form of government in order to get rid of some of the evils of society.

We are not altogether without remedy. The States have the power to deal with many phases of this subject, in fact with all phases of it.

The only way in which they can fall short of a complete remedy is the territorial limit of their powers, but so far as they go the States which compose this Union can in a large measure apply a remedy that will meet the evil complained of.

I should be quite willing just so far as I can find constitutional warrant for such legislation, to aid the States in suppressing these combinations and trusts which have undoubtedly produced many of the evils complained of. I would so reform the tariff as to take out of these combines the most important factor in them, eliminate from them the most important member, and that is the Government of the United States. By the provisions of our monstrous war tariff the Government of the United States has become a partner in these combines. It stands guard while the individual members of the partnership work their designs and carry out their purposes in regard to the objects of these combinations. I should be glad to unite in legislation that would reform this altogether.

But, sir, I have been very much struck in the course of this argument at the present session and also at the last Congress, more than a year ago, by the amendment introduced by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] to the bill of the Senator from Ohio when it was first presented to this body and referred to a committee, and which seemed to me to present for our consideration a proposition for Congressional action entirely within the powers conferred by the Constitution upon Congress, and which would go a long way, much further in my opinion even than the bill now before the Senate, towards correcting these evils. That was the amendment which the Senator from Mississippi has declined to offer to the bill at the present time, and which I have his permission to make my own. I therefore offer as an amendment to the bill the amendment which I send to the desk, and ask that it may be considered as in the nature of a substitute for the bill now before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Chief Clerk will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That all contracts, arrangements, agreements, trusts, or combinations between two or more persons or corporations, or between a corporation and a natural person engaged in selling, importing, manufacturing, or transporting articles of merchandise, made with a view of preventing or which tend to prevent, and all acts done by any person with a view of preventing or which tend to prevent, full and free competition in the importation, transportation, manufacturing, or sale of any article of merchandise, or which shall have the effect of advancing the cost of any such article to the consumer, are hereby declared to be unlawful to the extent herein provided, and subject to the provisions of the following section of this act: Provided, That this act shall not be construed to apply to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations between laborers made with the view of lessening the number of hours of labor or of increasing their wages; nor to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations among persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture made with the view of enhancing the price of agricultural or horticultural products.

SEC. 2. That when any action or suit in law or equity shall be commenced or shall be pending in any court of the United States, it shall be lawful for any defendant therein to except to the jurisdiction of such court upon the ground that the cause of action or suit is for the enforcement of a right of a person or corporation violating any of the provisions of the first section of this act based on a contract for the sale, exchange, or transportation, or based on any damage arising from any wrong committed in respect to any article of merchandise manufactured, transported, imported, bought, or sold in violation of the provisions of said first section; and if such ground of exception shall be proven to the satisfaction of the court, judgment of dismissal shall be entered, with double costs to the defendant and with such reasonable sum for the attorney's fees for the defense thereof as may be allowed by the court.

SEC. 3. That when the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any arrangement, trust, contract, agreement, or combination, as described in the first section of this act, has been formed, and that in consequence thereof there has been an enhancement of the price of any article of merchandise, he shall have power, and it is hereby made his duty, to issue his proclamation suspending the collection of all customs duties or import taxes on similar articles when imported into the United States from any foreign country. Such suspension shall continue for ninety days after the President, upon being satisfied that such enhancement in price no longer exists, shall issue his proclamation withdrawing his former proclamation of suspension. And the President of the United States may, from time to time, as may in his judgment be proper, reissue, modify, or withdraw any proclamation he may have issued.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President—

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Before the question is taken on that amendment I wish to offer an amendment to perfect the text of the original bill. The proposition of the Senator from Delaware is to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a substitute. I desire to offer an amendment to the original bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Such amendment will be in order, but the Senator from Delaware is entitled to the floor at this time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I understand that.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I desire to say only a few words in regard to this amendment which I have offered. It seems to me to have very carefully considered the question of what legislative power conferred by the Constitution upon Congress is appropriately applicable to this subject. It attempts in its second section, by invoking the judicial power of the Government, to provide, as it may do, that whenever the judicial power of the United States is appealed to by a citizen of any State, if it shall appear that the subject-matter of the suit between the parties is a contract which is based upon an arrangement, combination, or trust that is declared unlawful by the bill which is now before the Senate, or when either of the parties to the suit or proposed suit shall have violated any of the provisions in regard to unlawful combinations, trusts, and arrangements, then that fact may be pleaded by the party sought to be affected by the suit, and the United States court in which the suit is brought shall dismiss for want of jurisdiction any such cause of action before it, thus withholding from all who attempt to use the courts of the United States as a means of enforcing any matter or right claimed or growing out of such unlawful combinations, refusing the aid of the court to enforce such right or allowing that department of the Federal Government to be in any way ancillary to the cause of such arrangement or combination.

That goes a great way. The courts of the United States are the favorite resort for litigation between parties who are residents of different States, and where these large interests are concerned, stretching over the whole country, the parties generally being powerful corporations, the United States courts in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred would be the resort of litigants in matters growing out of such combinations or trusts. Then by this proposed legislation we absolutely forbid this class of suits being entertained, and thus disarm in a most important matter the power for evil of these combinations and illegal trusts.

That is one point of this proposed amendment. Another is that we shall attempt to do what I alluded to awhile ago, and that is measurably to dis sever this great Government of the United States from its unworthy association with these combines and trusts which are now formed under the operation of our high protective tariff, and to allow the President of the United States whenever he is satisfied that the price of any article is raised to the consumer by means of these combinations or trusts, and such articles are imported into the United States under the provisions of the protective tariff, to suspend the operation of that law imposing customs duties for a period not exceeding ninety days, and to exercise that power in such a manner and with such discretion as will enable him to accomplish the result sought.

Here is a practicable, constitutional, and effective remedy that, if applied, will be sustained by the courts; will strike a deadly blow at the existence of this complaint of combinations, associations, and trusts; will not be mere brutum fulmen, if passed; will not be an act merely of show. We shall not be merely prancing like a hobby-horse and making no advancement on the enemy, but we shall have directly, constitutionally, and effectually disabled and disarmed these impolitic organizations of the power for evil that they now possess.

Mr. President, if we are in earnest, as I profess to be about this matter, let us adopt a measure of legislation which is within the admitted powers of Congress, and not merely content ourselves by declarations as to the immorality and impolicy of these trusts, declaring, as this bill does in its first section, that these impolitic and illegal combinations may be attacked in some unprovided-for way by the Attorney-General of the United States; not contenting ourselves merely with providing that the circuit court of the United States shall have original jurisdiction of all suits of a civil nature at law or in equity arising under this section, and to issue by remedial process the orders or writs proper and necessary to enforce its provisions, when there is not from beginning to end of that section any provision or any clause that makes it possible for a circuit court of the United States to obtain jurisdiction over any of the matters arising out of these trusts or combinations. It is all well enough to provide that the Attorney-General shall appear for the United States, but no process, no form of suit, no means by which a lis mota can be created on behalf of the United States is found from beginning to end in that section.

I am opposed to what has been already called here a sham battle. I am opposed to merely parading before the country and denouncing in eloquent and declamatory terms these trusts and at the same time committing ourselves to measures which are so absolutely futile, so absolutely powerless to effect any result; but I shall be glad to unite, in the absence of any other suggestion that I have heard which seems to be feasible or constitutional, in making this substitute which I offer the law of the land, by which I believe that most if not all the evils that are complained of in regard to these combinations and trusts will be effectually dealt with.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to offer an amendment to come in at the end of section 1 of the bill, and as an addition to the proviso contained in that section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add at the end of the second proviso to section 1:

Nor to any arrangements, agreements, associations, or combinations among persons for the enforcement and execution of the laws of any State enacted in pursuance of its police powers; nor shall this act be held to control or abridge such powers of the States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President, I do not care to occupy the attention of the Senate at any length.

Mr. EUSTIS. Where does the Senator propose his amendment to come in?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I propose it as an addition to the proviso of section 1, and it is simply for the purpose of avoiding an effect which is likely to flow from the earlier provisions of that section. That section provides as follows:

That all arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between two or more persons or corporations, or both, made with a view or which tend to prevent full and free competition in the importation, transportation, or sale of articles imported into the United States, or with a view or which tend to prevent full and free competition in articles of growth, production, or manufacture of any State or Territory of the United States with similar articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of any other State or Territory, or in the transportation or sale of like articles, the production of any State or Territory of the United States, into or within any other State or Territory of the United States; and all arrangements, trusts, or combinations between such persons or corporations made with a view or which tend to advance the cost to the consumer of any such articles are hereby declared to be against public policy, unlawful, and void.

I will state frankly my purpose in offering the amendment. Under the provisions of this section, should it become a law, every organization in such a State as Iowa, for instance, of the character of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Temperance Alliance, and other organizations intended to promote the execution of the laws of that State in respect of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors would become illegal bodies and their movements subject to the terms and provisions of this bill. I know that was not intended, and yet the language, without being stripped of its power by the amendment I propose, would include all organizations of that kind. All I ask is that the subjects within the police power of the States as embraced within that legislation, of Iowa and any other State which may desire similar legislation, shall not be embraced within this provision, but that the States shall be left free in the execution of their police powers.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for the reading of the amendment again. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again stated. The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the second proviso already agreed to at the end of section 1:

Nor to any arrangements, agreements, associations, or combinations among persons for the enforcement and execution of the laws of any State enacted in pursuance of its police powers; nor shall this act be held to control or abridge such powers of the States.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will just add to what I have said that the proviso to which I offered this as an amendment excepts from the operations of this section of the bill arrangements, agreements, or combinations between laborers, made with a view of lessening the number of hours of their labor or of increasing their wages, and it also excepts arrangements, agreements, associations, or combinations among persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture, made with a view of enhancing the price of their own agricultural or horticultural products. I think that the exception which I ask to have made by this amendment is quite as worthy of the support of the Senate as either of these.

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to ask the Senator if his amendment accomplishes his object. I understand his object is to protect combinations of persons intended to discourage the use and manufacture of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. My object is to exclude them from the operation of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I understand, to protect them from being affected by it. But the only description in his amendment is of such associations as are in aid of the execution of the laws of a State in pursuance of its police power. Now, if this bill without his amendment would render the class of persons he has described subject to the penal provision, all temperance societies whose object is to persuade mankind not to use intoxicating liquors would still remain in spite of his amendment within the purview of the bill. It seems to me he should extend his amendment a little further, because, as far as my State goes, this class of associations which he has described do not confine their efforts to the execution of the law, but their efforts are a great deal more extensive and extend to discouraging the use or manufacture of intoxicating liquors altogether. This is what he means, and we would all vote for it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am satisfied that my amendment will cover the purpose I have in view concerning my State. If other Senators desire something further in regard to their States, they can move it.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend the Senator's amendment by adding to it:

Or to discourage the use or manufacture of intoxicating liquors.

And we will take a vote on that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa:

Or to discourage the use or manufacture of intoxicating liquors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Iowa showed me his amendment. As these organizations in Iowa are associated and organized something in the nature of a corporation, there might be some reason for believing that they possibly might fall within the meaning of the clauses of the bill. Therefore, I have no objection to his amendment, but I do not see any reason for putting in temperance societies any more than churches or school-houses or any other kind of moral or educational associations that may be organized. Such an association is not in any sense a combination or arrangement made to interfere with interstate commerce; but under the peculiar circumstances, upon the facts stated by the Senator from Iowa, I think it is very proper to make an exception of those organizations in Iowa which are really in aid of the execution of State law. I would apply it to all organizations which are using either moral or any other kind of means for the enforcement of local laws; but I do not think it is worth while to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, because that would include temperance societies. You might as well include churches and Sunday schools.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I have been quietly sitting here listening to this debate and voting on numerous amendments now for three or four days, and have said nothing. I am very anxious to vote for some proper bill that will abolish and uproot the trusts that are interfering with the legitimate business of the country, and I had hoped when we commenced this discussion that we should confine our work to that subject alone. But we have been proceeding now for several days, numerous amendments have been offered, and almost every conceivable subject has been dragged in and attached to the bill that was for the purpose of uprooting and prohibiting trusts. I do not think there has been a single amendment offered to which there have not been very serious objections made on the ground of its unconstitutionality. It is utterly useless for us to pass a bill just for the fun of it, or to pass a bill that is unconstitutional, or to undertake to pass a bill that covers every subject in which the people are interested.

While I am very anxious to pass a proper bill that will prohibit trusts and break them up and protect the people of this country I should much prefer having a bill carefully considered by a committee in order that we may intelligently vote upon it.

While I do not know whether the honorable Senator from Ohio will consent to it or not, yet I very much hope he will consent to a recommitment of the bill, with all the amendments, to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. It would take two weeks longer.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not care if it does. I want to get something out of this measure that will do some good and not do any harm. In my judgment we are liable to pass something here that will destroy business instead of protecting the legitimate business of the country. Everybody who knows me, in the Senate and elsewhere, I think, knows me well enough to be assured that I am for the interest of the people. If I can find out what that is and if we can do it constitutionally and legitimately. But I am not willing to vote for a bill about which there is very serious doubt as to whether we will not injure the interests of the people, instead of protecting and benefiting them.

I hope, as there has seemed to be an indisposition to refer this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, that the Committee on Finance will consent that the bill shall be recommitment to them, and I believe, in the light of the discussion which has been had of the original bill and of the several amendments that have been offered to it, that committee in a very few days' time will be able to perfect a bill for which we all can vote, and which we can pass without three or four days' discussion, as we have had on this bill as it is.

Sir, I do not want to delay this subject, neither do I desire that the business of the Senate shall be interfered with, but this is as important a question as can come before us, and it is important that we should get the bill in proper shape before we pass it. I know that the Senator from Ohio is anxious to pass a proper bill on this subject, and I trust he will consent that the Senate shall recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance in order that they may report it to the Senate again after they have maturely considered the different amendments before them.

I hope the Senate will vote upon a motion and vote in favor of a motion, whether the Senator from Ohio desires the bill to go back to that committee or not, to send it back to the Finance Committee, with all of the amendments that have been offered, the most of which have been adopted, and let them consider the various propositions in their committee-room carefully, and then bring in here a measure which they think ought to be passed, and I have no doubt the Senate will pass it. I make that motion, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois moves that the bill be recommitment to the Committee on Finance. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. SHERMAN. After four days' debate, all that is required is for us to have a vote upon these amendments. The Senate have now got all the information that can be communicated by the committee. There is no use in a reference of the bill; and if we go on in that way transacting the business of the country we shall never close this session.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator knows better than anybody else in the Senate that it is a difficult matter for a body of eighty men to consider a bill maturely and carefully and be as nearly right in its consideration as a committee of eight or ten men in their room, where they can read it section by section and line by line and determine upon its constitutionality and upon its effect on the business of the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that every sentence and every line of the bill has been read to the Senate over and over again. It has been printed three times and the only point of difference now (and but for that point I believe the bill would have passed before this time) is whether the seventh section sufficiently defines what are called "futures." That doubt has arrested the passage of the bill, and but for that it would have passed before this time. Now that doubt has practically been removed by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CULLOM. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas has been criticised here, and has been amended hurriedly. The Senate does not know now, in my opinion, what the amendment to that amendment is which has been adopted by the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. Upon my word, it has been read many times.

Mr. EUSTIS. I appeal to the Senator from Ohio. I do not think that he is fairly treating the friends of the trust bill properly by insisting upon a vote in regard to these amendments. For instance, take my case. I am in favor of the bill reported by the Senator from Ohio and of the amendment of the Senator from Texas. I will vote for that bill. I think it is a proper bill, and I think it is a bill that ought to be passed by Congress; but by refusing to have this bill recommitment to the committee I am forced into the position of voting against the bill, because I can not vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me ask the Senator from Louisiana how much better off he would be. Suppose we take the bill back to the committee, go over it again, and bring it in here. It will have lost its place on the Calendar or anywhere else, we shall have lost time, and it may be a long while before it can be taken up, and then we shall have the same questions presented. If a majority of the Senate are in favor of attaching the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the bill, let them say so now. Now is the time. If a majority of the Senate reject the bill on any account whatever, let it be so. I do not see what help it will be to send it to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EUSTIS. I think the Senator from Ohio probably may discover that there may be a change of views in this body.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not much conceive it.

Mr. EUSTIS. The bill can be reported in a few days.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Committee on Finance should see fit to report the bill without the amendment that has been offered by me, I pledge myself distinctly to offer it again when the bill comes to the Senate.

Mr. DOLPH. I wish to say that I believe the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to be the important part of this bill. If any portion of the bill will accomplish the purpose designed this will, and if any part of the bill, in my judgment, is within the constitutional power of Congress the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas is. But I think the Senator from Kansas has inadvertently, not having given the matter his usual careful consideration, taken the life out of his entire amendment. He has destroyed by the amendment to the proviso sections 6 and 7, and if those sections are destroyed there is nothing left of his proposition, because it now provides that the whole act shall not apply to bona fide contracts for the actual delivery of the property contracted for.

If there is such a contract it is not necessary for the party to deliver the article. If the contract is made in good faith and the seller does not choose to deliver the article he simply pays the damages, he pays the difference in the price; but if you were to go further and had the power, which you have not, to provide that it shall be delivered, it would not stop gambling in futures at all, because if there were half a million bushels of corn in the elevators in Chicago the warehouse receipts of that grain would be floating around the city; they would pass from hand to hand like checks upon money deposited in a bank, and you could every day in the year deliver, because the delivery of the receipt for the corn in the warehouse would be a delivery of the corn, and you could actually deliver and contract every day in the year for ten or twenty million bushels of corn.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, every Senator who speaks discloses to me the hopelessness of this situation. It is quite impossible to specify what propositions will receive the approval of a majority of the Senate, and yet the combinations of all the propositions may be such that nobody will vote for the bill, and that is just about where we stand now. I think the bill as it stands now literally has not a friend in the Senate. The Senator from Ohio indicates practically that it is an impossibility for anybody to vote for it as it stands.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. HAWLEY. I understood the Senator to say that the bill as it is just now ought not to pass.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. HAWLEY. Very well; I think that nine-tenths of the Senate would say so. That is my opinion of it.

Mr. INGALLS. A majority of the amendments have been offered subsequently to the last amendment adopted to section 7.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yet that was adopted by the Senate. There are half a dozen amendments there bunched together that received the approval of the Senate apparently.

Mr. President, I have a few words more to say. Nobody from the Committee on Finance has advocated this bill except its distinguished reporter and perhaps author. I do not remember that any one else has spoken for it from that committee. But we have a committee in the Senate chosen for the express purpose of considering great general laws, statutes that are intended to remain and do great work. A bill like this is not intended for the Military or Naval Committee or the Appropriations Committee, or in my judgment for the Finance Committee or the Committee on the Library or any one of the forty committees. There is just one committee that ought to take a subject of this magnitude under consideration and give us legal advice.

Most of us are lawyers, but few of us can give this question the study and consideration we feel it ought to have. However, we have chosen a body of veteran teachers and practitioners of law for the express purpose of getting the best advice possible, and we have not used our own machinery.

I can not vote for the bill as it stands now. You may shear off any one of half a dozen things that remain and yet I could not vote for it. But there is a broad, general purpose of the bill as originally reported that I approve.

Now, I move sincerely, and with a desire to get at the truth, to amend the motion of the Senator from Illinois by inserting the Judiciary Committee, so as to refer the bill to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. The vote must be taken separately on that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. INGALLS. What was the motion of the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HAWLEY. The question is on the motion for reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not hear the motion of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from Illinois had moved to recommit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Illinois to recommit takes precedence of the amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move to amend so as to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. INGALLS. A motion to commit can only be amended by adding instructions, not by moving to refer to another committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas is clearly right.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move to refer, with instructions to report within a fortnight.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The motion to recommit to the Committee on Finance can not be amended, I think, under the rules, by a change to another committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has so decided, but instructions to the committee it is competent for the Senate to give, if it chooses.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to say one word further. I wish to distinctly state that I am earnestly in favor of a proper and well matured anti-trust bill, and I want one passed just as soon as it can be done. The only reason why I desired that the bill should go back to the Finance Committee was because there seemed to be an objection to its going to the Judiciary Committee. The impression seemed to prevail in some minds that that was in the interest of killing the bill.

Now, I have made the motion to recommit, in the interest of passing the bill just as quickly as possible.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think the Senator's intimation is not quite courteous to any committee of this body. When a proposition is made to refer a bill to a committee, I do not know of any committee that has ever said, "We do not care to consider it; it is none of our business; somebody else ought to have it;" or, "We do not want to be vexed about it." We have no such condition here.

Mr. CULLOM. I am making no suggestion of that kind myself. I am simply stating that expressions have been made that referring the bill to the Judiciary Committee was in the interest of strangling the bill entirely. The reason why I make the motion to refer it to the Finance Committee is because I do not want it strangled. I want to refer it to its friends. I want to refer it to the committee that brought it here. So far as their ability is concerned, everybody knows that many if not all the members of that committee are as eminent lawyers as are the members of the Judiciary Committee. In my judgment if it can go back to that committee, that committee can bring it here inside of three days perfected, and by unanimous consent, in my opinion, the Senate would allow it to be taken up and acted upon without delay.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only wish to say, without referring to the merits of this case, that the Senator from Illinois is entirely mistaken, so far as I know, in supposing that any single member of the Committee on the Judiciary wishes to strangle this bill, the great purposes of which I believe every member of the committee is in favor of. I am not in favor of referring it to the Committee on the Judiciary. I wish the committee which chose to take possession of the subject shall work it out; but I think it due to the members of the Committee on the Judiciary to say that, so far as I know, there is not a single member of that committee who does not agree with the Senator from Illinois in desiring to suppress these evils.

Mr. CULLOM. I am still misunderstood. I do not intimate that in my opinion the Judiciary Committee is against this bill at all, but there seemed to be a disinclination to refer it there, and I want the bill referred to its friends, who can bring it back here as quickly as possible.

Mr. BUTLER. Every time the proposition is made to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary I am reminded of shaking a red flag at a bull; the members of that committee appear to get in a very high state of indignation. I was going to suggest, in view of what the Senator from Vermont said some time ago, that he had taken his life in his hand when he made some proposition to his colleague on that committee, that each member of that committee be disarmed before we go any further with this discussion, if there is any danger of that sort.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] to the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. PLATT. The motion of the Senator from Illinois can not be amended in that way.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the amendment was declared out of order, Mr. BLAIR. I should like before this matter goes any further to inquire of the Senator from Ohio if he will be so good as to inform the Senate when we are to have a vote upon this proposition?

Mr. SHERMAN. In the course of an hour.

Mr. BLAIR. In the course of an hour? Very well; I am satisfied with that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut to the motion of the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is that amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is that the committee shall be instructed to report within two weeks.

Mr. INGALLS. The Committee on Finance?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAWLEY. No, I beg pardon; I made no such motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not hear the amendment, but was so informed at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HAWLEY. In what way I can parliamentarily, I wish to get this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary. That is my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair ruled that motion out of order, and understood the Senator to propose to amend by adding instructions.

Mr. HAWLEY. No. Of course I submit to the ruling of the Chair. I shall vote against the motion to refer to the Committee on Finance, and I shall make a motion to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary if I can get an opportunity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was not agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 17, noes 31.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. HAWLEY. I move to refer the bill and all amendments to the Committee on the Judiciary, and if it be proper I would add, with instructions to report within a fortnight.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that that motion is in order. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the bill and amendments be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions that that committee shall report back to the Senate within two weeks. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Connecticut.

The motion was not agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 24, noes 29.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. VANCE (at 6 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.). I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN and others. Oh, no.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope that motion will not be made until an order is made to reprint the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. On that motion to adjourn I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS (to Mr. SHERMAN). You do not need them, I think. Do not call for them until it becomes necessary.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; I withdraw the demand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HOAR. I will withdraw my amendment, solely in the interest of saving time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question then recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. BUTLER. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. As I do not know how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. COKE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], who is absent. I do not know how he would vote, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I am paired upon this question with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. DOLPH (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I transfer the pair I have with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] to the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], and vote "yea."

Mr. HAMPTON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. DIXON]. Not knowing how he would vote, I shall withhold my vote, though I should vote "yea" if he were present.

Mr. HEARST (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague [Mr. STANFORD].

Mr. HISCOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. FAULKNER (when Mr. KENNA's name was called). My colleague [Mr. KENNA] requested me to say that he is necessarily detained from the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. CASEY].

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR].

Mr. SQUIRE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] on political questions. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BLACKBURN. My colleague [Mr. BECK] is absent necessarily on account of the condition of his health. If he were here he would vote "yea," unless his pair should prevent it.

I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], who is absent. If he were here I should vote "yea."

Mr. SAWYER. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. PUGH. I desire to announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. MORGAN] with the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS].

Mr. HALE (after having voted in the negative). I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine withdraws his vote.

Mr. RANSOM. I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE]. If he were here I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Bate, Berry, Eustis, Faulkner, George,	Gibson, Gorman, Gray, Harris, McPherson,	Pasco, Pugh, Turpie, Vance, Vest,	Voorhees, Walthall, Wilson of Md.
--	--	---	---

NAYS—26.

Aldrich, Allen, Allison, Blair, Chandler, Cockrell, Cullom,	Dawes, Farwell, Hawley, Higgins, Hoar, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada,	McMillan, Mitchell, Moody, Morrill, Paddock, Pierce, Plumb,	Reagan, Sherman, Spooner, Washburn, Wilson of Iowa.

ABSENT—33.

Barbour, Beck, Blackburn, Blodgett, Brown, Butler, Call, Cameron, Casey, Coke,	Colquitt, Daniel, Davis, Dixon, Dolph, Edmunds, Evarts, Frye, Hale, Hampton,	Hearst, Hiscock, Jones of Arkansas, Kenna, Manderson, Morgan, Payne, Pettigrew, Platt, Quay,	Ransom, Sawyer, Stanford, Stewart, Teller, Wolcott.
---	---	---	--

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRAY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to the bill, and ask that it be read. Is the bill in the Senate or in Committee of the Whole?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. GRAY. I move to add after section 5 the section which I have sent to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment proposed.

The CHIEF CLERK. After section 5 it is proposed to insert the following new section:

Sect.—That when the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any arrangement, trust, contract, agreement, or combination, as described in the first section of this act, has been formed, and that in consequence thereof there has been an enhancement of the price of any article of merchandise, he shall have power, and it is hereby made his duty, to issue his proclamation suspending the collection of all customs duties or import taxes on similar articles when imported into the United States from any foreign country. Such suspension shall continue for ninety days after the President, upon being satisfied that such enhancement in price no longer exists, shall issue his proclamation withdrawing his former proclamation of suspension. And the President of the United States may, from time to time, as may in his judgment be proper, revise, modify, or withdraw any proclamation he may have issued.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the amendment?

Mr. VEST. I call for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLACKBURN (when his name was called). I repeat the announcement of my pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] and the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. BECK]. He would vote "yea" if present, and so would I.

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

Mr. COKE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] on this bill. I do not know how he would vote on this amendment and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. DOLPH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. HAMPTON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. DIXON].

Mr. HISCOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES]; otherwise I should vote "nay."

Mr. BERRY (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, was called). My colleague [Mr. JONES], if present, would vote "yea."

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR] and I make this announcement once for all this evening, unless the bill should come to a final vote.

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE]. If he were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. SAWYER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. SQUIRE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HALE. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, after conference with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK], I will on this vote transfer my pair from the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], who is detained by illness from the Chamber, to my colleague [Mr. BECK]. I will ask to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HALE. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Bate, Berry, Blackburn, Cockrell, Edmunds, Eustis,	Faulkner, George, Gibson, Gorman, Gray, Harris,	McPherson, Pasco, Pugh, Reagan, Turpie, Vance,	Vest, Voorhees, Walthall.
---	--	---	---------------------------------

NAYS—25.

Aldrich, Allen, Allison, Blair, Chandler, Cullom, Dawes,	Farwell, Hale, Hawley, Higgins, Hoar, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada,	McMillan, Moody, Morrill, Paddock, Payne, Pierce, Plumb,	Sherman, Spooner, Washburn, Wilson of Iowa.

ABSENT—36.

Barbour, Beck, Blodgett, Brown, Butler, Call, Cameron, Casey, Coke,	Colquitt, Daniel, Davis, Dixon, Dolph, Evarts, Frye, Hampton, Hearst,	Hiscock, Jones of Arkansas, Kenna, Manderson, Mitchell, Morgan, Pettigrew, Platt, Quay,	Ransom, Sawyer, Stanford, Stewart, Stockbridge, Teller, Wilson of Md. Wolcott.
---	---	---	---

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. VEST. I move to amend the bill, in section 9, line 5, by striking out the word "one," before the word "thousand," and inserting "ten."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 9, line 5, before the word "thousand," it is proposed to strike out "one" and insert "ten," so as to read:

Dealers in "options" or "futures" shall pay annually the sum of $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to—ayes 28, noes not counted.

Mr. COKE. I voted on the division inadvertently. I forgot for the moment that I was paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. TURPIE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 22, noes 30.

Mr. VANCE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit a request that some hour may be designated to-morrow when the vote shall be taken on this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the Senator submitting a request, a motion to adjourn being pending?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont objects.

Mr. VANCE. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn at the request of Senators around me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the Senator withdrawing the call for the yeas and nays. The Chair hears none, and the call is withdrawn. The motion to adjourn has been disagreed to.

Mr. VEST. In line 15 of section 10, before the word "thousand," I move to strike out "one" and insert "ten;" so as to conform to the former amendment made on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 10, line 15, before the word "thousand," it is proposed to strike out "one" and insert "ten;" so as to read:

And shall thereupon pay to such collector the sum aforesaid of $10,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I raise the point of order on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. These amounts have been inserted by an amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, and consequently they are not now amendable. Most of these amendments have been out of order. I feel bound to raise the point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment, being an amendment already agreed to as in Committee of the Whole, is not now amendable by the change proposed by the Senator from Missouri, and his amendment is not in order.

Mr. VEST. I suppose I can offer the amendment in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be in order in the Senate. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there are no further amendments, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has made sundry amendments to the bill.

Mr. VEST. Now I submit my amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. The first question is on the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole; and then the Chair asks whether the question shall be put in gross or whether certain amendments shall be reserved.

Mr. INGALLS. I wish to reserve all the amendments made to section 7, I think it is, beginning with that offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. EDMUNDS. Reserve all the amendments; take them all one by one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All the amendments are reserved. The question will be put on each amendment separately, and the Secretary will report for information the first amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, it is very evident now that we can not vote intelligently to-night upon the bill with all these amendments unprinted unless we extend this session very late indeed. It is a most important bill and we have done a long day's work. I hope now that some proposition will be entertained to fix an hour when we shall vote to-morrow, and that we shall adjourn and have the bill printed in the mean time for the information of the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask unanimous consent that the vote be taken on the bill and amendments without further discussion at 4 o'clock in the afternoon to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To that I object, for the reason that I have some observations to make when the bill shall have been perfected, and so I object to any arrangement of that kind. We had better finish the bill to-night. We understand what the propositions are.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the first amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUTLER (at 6 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.). I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The question being put, there were, on a division—yeas 25, noes 26.

Mr. BUTLER. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON], but, believing that he would vote "yea" on this proposition if present, I vote "yea."

Mr. COKE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 23, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—23.
Bate,	Faulkner,	Harris,	Turpie,
Berry,	George,	McPherson,	Vance,
Blackburn,	Gibson,	Pasco,	Vest,
Butler,	Gorman,	Payne,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Gray,	Pugh,	Walthall.
Eustis,	Hampton,	Reagan,
NAYS—25.
Aldrich,	Dolph,	Ingalls,	Plumb,
Allen,	Edmunds,	McMillan,	Sherman,
Allison,	Farwell,	Mitchell,	Spooner,
Chandler,	Hale,	Moody,	Washburn,
Cullom,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Wilson of Iowa,
Davis,	Higgins,	Paddock,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Pierce,
ABSENT—33.
Barbour,	Colquitt,	Kenna,	Stanford,
Beck,	Daniel,	Manderson,	Stewart,
Blair,	Dixon,	Morgan,	Stockbridge,
Blodgett,	Evarts,	Pettigrew,	Teller,
Brown,	Frye,	Platt,	Wilson of Md.
Call,	Hearst,	Quay,	Wolcott.
Cameron,	Hiscock,	Ransom,
Casey,	Jones of Arkansas,	Sawyer,
Coke,	Jones of Nevada,	Squire,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, there being on a division—yeas 24, noes 22.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before that is done I ask for an order to reprint the bill with the amendments which have been made to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 26, 1890.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

CORRECTIONS.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, on page 2673 of the RECORD, under reports filed, it appears that as a member of the Committee on Printing I reported a concurrent resolution of the Senate to print 2,500 extra copies of the report of the health officer of the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. As a fact the concurrent resolution was passed by the House of Representatives and was not referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Journal so shows.

Mr. CARLISLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to a clerical error in an amendment offered by myself on yesterday and agreed to by the House when the world's fair bill was under consideration. In the preparation of the amendment the word "said" is written instead of the word "such." I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be directed, in engrossing the bill, to substitute the word "such" for the word "said." The meaning is plain in the amendment, and it is a mere clerical error.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made as requested.

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER. An enrolled bill was submitted to the House on yesterday evening in such condition that the Chair thinks it should be again submitted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KENNEDY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 525) to establish two additional land offices in the State of Montana.

SPECIAL ORDER.

Mr. CANNON. As a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, I report back the following resolution with a substitute, the adoption of which is recommended by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Wednesday, March 26, immediately after the approval of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration in the House of the bill for the admission of Wyoming, and that, unless previously ordered by the House, the previous question shall be deemed ordered on the engrossment, third reading, and final passage of the bill at 4 o'clock p. m. of that day.

The committee offer the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That to-day, immediately after the passage of this resolution, the House enter upon the consideration of the bill for the admission of Wyoming, and at 6 o'clock and 30 minutes take a recess until 11 o'clock Thursday next; and at 1 o'clock of that day the previous question be considered as ordered on the three amendments proposed by the minority and on the bill to its passage.

The substitute was agreed to; and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMONSTRANCES AGAINST EXPENDITURES FOR WAR-LIKE PURPOSES.

Mr. MARTIN, of Indiana, obtained unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the following memorial; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

Remonstrance of Back Creek, Fairmount, Deer Creek, and Marion Monthly Meetings of Friends of Grant County, Indiana, against proposed large expenditures of public money for naval, coast defense, and other warlike measures.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, your petitioners of Deer Creek Monthly Meeting of Friends, Grant County, State of Indiana, numbering 225 adult persons, respectfully, but earnestly, entreat your honorable bodies to reject the recommendations of the Senate Naval Committee, and other measures which propose a large expenditure for the Navy and so-called coast defenses and other warlike preparations, all of which we believe are a menace to the peace and security of the nation.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCook, its Secretary, announced the passage of bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; in which concurrence was requested:

A bill (S. 3025) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to gather full and authentic information as to the present condition and preservation of the fur-seal interests of the Government in the region of Alaska, as compared with its condition in 1870; also full information as to the impending extinction of the sea-otter industry, and kindred lines of inquiry, etc.;

A bill (S. 2860) to authorize the construction of an addition to the public building in Houston, Tex., and to provide a cistern, heating apparatus, etc., for said building; and Joint resolution (S. R. 46) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to remove the naval magazine from Ellis Island, in New York Harbor, and to purchase a site and erect a naval magazine at some other point, and for other purposes.

ADMISSION OF WYOMING.

Mr. BAKER. I call up the bill for the admission of Wyoming. The bill has been read in Committee of the Whole, and I do not suppose it is necessary to read it again.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I have not heard that bill read, and I think it should be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas the people of the Territory of Wyoming did, on the 30th day of September, 1889, by a convention of delegates called and assembled for that purpose, form for themselves a constitution, which constitution was ratified and adopted by the people of said Territory at the election held therefor on the first Tuesday in November, 1889, which constitution is republican in form and is in conformity with the Constitution of the United States; and

Whereas said convention and the people of the said Territory have asked the admission of said Territory into the Union of States on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the State of Wyoming is hereby declared to be a State of the United States of America, and is hereby declared admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever; and that the constitution which the people of Wyoming have formed for themselves be, and the same is hereby, accepted, ratified, and confirmed.

SEC. 2. That the said State shall consist of all the territory included within the following boundaries, to wit: Commencing at the intersection of the twenty-seventh meridian of longitude west from Washington with the forty-fifth degree of north latitude and running thence west to the thirty-fourth meridian of west longitude; thence south to the forty-first degree of north latitude; thence east to the twenty-seventh meridian of west longitude, and thence north to the place of beginning.

SEC. 3. That until the next general census, or until otherwise provided by law, said State shall be entitled to one Representative in the House of Representatives of the United States, and the election of the Representative to the Fifty-first Congress and the Representative to the Fifty-second Congress shall take place at the time and be conducted and certified in the same manner as is provided in the constitution of the State for the election of State, district, and other officers.

SEC. 4. That sections numbered 16 and 36 in every township of said proposed State, and, where such sections, or any parts thereof, have been sold or otherwise disposed of by or under the authority of any act of Congress, other lands equivalent thereto, in legal subdivisions of not less than one quarter-section, and as contiguous as may be to the section in lieu of which the same is taken, are hereby granted to said State for the support of common schools, such indemnity lands to be selected within said State in such manner as the Legislature may provide, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That section 6 of the act of Congress of August 9, 1888, entitled "An act to authorize the leasing of the school and university lands in the Territory of Wyoming, and for other purposes," shall apply to the school and university indemnity lands of the said State of Wyoming so far as applicable.

SEC. 5. That all lands herein granted for educational purposes shall be disposed of only at public sale, the proceeds to constitute a permanent school fund, the interest of which only shall be expended in the support of said schools. But said lands may, under such regulations as the Legislature shall prescribe, be leased for periods of not more than five years, in quantities not exceeding one section to any one person or company; and such land shall not be subject to pre-emption, homestead entry, or any other entry under the land laws of the United States, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, but shall be reserved for school purposes only.

SEC. 6. That fifty sections of the unappropriated public lands within said State, to be selected and located in legal subdivisions as provided in section 4 of this act, shall be, and are hereby, granted to said State for the purpose of erecting public buildings at the capital of said State.

SEC. 7. That 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of public lands lying within said State which shall be sold by the United States subsequent to the admission of said State into the Union, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, shall be paid to the said State, to be used as a permanent fund, the interest of which only shall be expended for the support of the common schools within said State.

SEC. 8. That the lands granted to the Territory of Wyoming by the act of February 18, 1881, entitled "An act to grant lands to Dakota, Montana, Arizona, Idaho, and Wyoming for university purposes," are hereby vested in the State of Wyoming, to the extent of the full quantity of 72 sections to said State, and any portion of said lands that may not have been selected by said Territory of Wyoming may be selected by the said State; but said act of February 18, 1881, shall be so amended as to provide that none of said lands shall be sold for less than $10 per acre, and the proceeds shall constitute a permanent fund to be safely invested and held by said State and the income thereof be used exclusively for university purposes. The schools, colleges, and universities provided for in this act shall forever remain under the exclusive control of the said State, and no part of the proceeds arising from the sale or disposal of any lands herein granted for educational purposes shall be used for the support of any sectarian or denominational school, college, or university. The section of land granted by the act of May 28, 1884, to the Territory of Wyoming for a fish hatchery and other public purposes shall, upon the admission of said State of Wyoming into the Union, become the property of said State.

SEC. 9. That the penitentiary at Laramie City, Wyo., and all lands connected therewith and set apart and reserved therefor, and unexpended appropriations of money therefor, are hereby granted to the State of Wyoming.

SEC. 10. That 90,000 acres of land, to be selected and located as provided in section 4 of this act, are hereby granted to said State for the use and support of an agricultural college in said State, as provided in the acts of Congress making donations of lands for such purpose.

SEC. 11. That in lieu of the grant of land for purposes of internal improvement made to new States by the eighth section of the act of September 4, 1841, which section is hereby repealed as to the State of Wyoming, and in lieu of any claim or demand by the said State under the act of September 28, 1850, and section 2479 of the Revised Statutes, making a grant of swamp and overflowed lands to certain States, which grant it is hereby declared is not extended to the State of Wyoming, and in lieu of any grant of saline lands to said State, the following grants of land are hereby made, to wit:

To the State of Wyoming: For the establishment and maintenance and support in the said State of the insane asylum in Uinta County, 30,000 acres; for the penal, reform, or educational institution in Carbon County, 30,000 acres; for the penitentiary in Albany County, 30,000 acres; for the fish hatchery in Albany County, 10,000 acres; for the deaf, dumb, and blind asylum in Laramie County, 30,000 acres; for the poor farm in Fremont County, 30,000 acres; for a miners' hospital, 30,000 acres; for normal schools, 100,000 acres; for State charitable, educational, penal, and reformatory institutions, 210,000 acres; making a total of 500,000 acres.

SEC. 12. That the State of Wyoming shall not be entitled to any further or other grants of land for any purpose than as expressly provided in this act; and the lands granted by this section shall be held, appropriated, and disposed of exclusively for the purposes herein mentioned, in such manner as the Legislature of the State may provide.

SEC. 13. That all mineral lands shall be exempted from the grants made by this act. But if sections 16 and 36, or any subdivision or portion of any smallest subdivision thereof in any township, shall be found by the Department of the Interior to be mineral lands, said State is hereby authorized and empowered to select, in legal subdivisions, an equal quantity of other unappropriated lands in said State in lieu thereof, for the use and the benefit of the common schools of said State.

SEC. 14. That all lands granted in quantity or as indemnity by this act shall be selected, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, from the surveyed, unreserved, and unappropriated public lands of the United States within the limits of the State entitled thereto. And there shall be deducted from the number of acres of land donated by this act for specific objects to said State the number of acres heretofore donated by Congress to said Territory for similar objects.

SEC. 15. That the sum of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to said Territory for defraying the expenses of the said convention and for the payment of the members thereof, under the same rules and regulations and at the same rates as are now provided by law for the payment of the Territorial Legislatures, and for the elections held therefor and thereunder. Any money hereby appropriated not necessary for such purpose shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 16. That the said State, when admitted as aforesaid, shall constitute a judicial district, the name thereof to be the same as the name of the State; and the circuit and district courts therefor shall be held at the capital of the State for the time being, and the said district shall, for judicial purposes, until otherwise provided, be attached to the eighth judicial circuit. There shall be appointed for said district one district judge, one United States attorney, and one United States marshal. The judge of said district shall receive a yearly salary of $3,500, payable in four equal installments, on the 1st days of January, April, July, and October of each year, and shall reside in the district. There shall be appointed clerks of said courts in the said district, who shall keep their offices at the capital of said State. The regular terms of said courts shall be held in said district at the place aforesaid on the first Monday in April and the first Monday in November of each year, and only one grand jury and one petit jury shall be summoned in both said circuit and district courts. The circuit and district courts for said district, and the judges thereof, respectively, shall possess the same powers and jurisdiction, and perform the same duties required to be performed by the other circuit and district courts and judges of the United States, and shall be governed by the same laws and regulations. The marshal, district attorney, and clerks of the circuit and district courts of said district, and all other officers and persons performing duties in the administration of justice therein, shall severally possess the powers and perform the duties lawfully possessed and required to be performed by similar officers in other districts of the United States; and shall, for the services they may perform, receive the fees and compensation allowed by law to other similar officers and persons performing similar duties in the State of Oregon.

SEC. 17. That all cases of appeal or writ of error heretofore prosecuted and now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States upon any record from the supreme court of said Territory, or that may hereafter lawfully be prosecuted upon any record from said courts, may be heard and determined by said Supreme Court of the United States. And the mandate of execution or of further proceedings shall be directed by the Supreme Court of the United States to the circuit or district court hereby established within the said State from or to the supreme court of such State, as the nature of the case may require. And the circuit, district, and State courts herein named shall, respectively, be the successors of the supreme court of the Territory, as to all such cases arising within the limits embraced within the jurisdiction of such courts, respectively, with full power to proceed with the same, and award mesne or final process therein; and that from all judgments and decrees of the supreme court of the Territory mentioned in this act, in any case arising within the limits of the proposed State prior to admission, the parties to such judgment shall have the same right to prosecute appeals and writs of error to the Supreme Court of the United States as they shall have had by law prior to the admission of said State into the Union.

SEC. 18. That in respect to all cases, proceedings, and matters now pending in the supreme or district courts of the said Territory at the time of the admission into the Union of the State of Wyoming and arising within the limits of such State, whereof the circuit or district courts by this act established might have had jurisdiction under the laws of the United States had such courts existed at the time of commencement of such cases, the said circuit and district courts, respectively, shall be the successors of said supreme and district courts of said Territory; and in respect to all other cases, proceedings, and matters pending in the supreme or district courts of the said Territory at the time of the admission of such Territory into the Union, arising within the limits of said State, the courts established by such State shall, respectively, be the successors of said supreme and district Territorial courts; and all the files, records, indictments, and proceedings relating to any such cases shall be transferred to such circuit, district, and State courts, respectively, and the same shall be proceeded with therein in due course of law; but no writ, action, indictment, cause, or proceeding now pending, or that prior to the admission of the State shall be pending, in any Territorial court in said Territory shall abate by the admission of such State into the Union, but the same shall be transferred and proceeded with in the proper United States circuit, district, or State court, as the case may be: Provided, however, That in all civil actions, causes, and proceedings in which the United States is not a party, transfers shall not be made to the circuit and district courts of the United States except upon written request of one of the parties to such action or proceeding filed in the proper court; and in the absence of such request such cases shall be proceeded with in the proper State courts.

SEC. 19. That the Legislature of the said State may elect two Senators of the United States as is provided by the constitution of said State, and the Senators and Representatives of said State shall be entitled to be admitted to seats in Congress and to all the rights and privileges of Senators and Representatives of other States in the Congress of the United States.

SEC. 20. That until the State officers are elected and qualified under the provisions of the constitution of said State, the officers of the Territory of Wyoming shall discharge the duties of their respective offices under the constitution of the State, in the manner and form as therein provided.

SEC. 21. That from and after the admission of said State into the Union, in pursuance of this act, the laws of the United States, not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said State as elsewhere within the United States; and all laws in force made by said Territory, at the time of its admission into the Union, until amended or repealed, shall be in force in said State, except as modified or changed by this act or by the constitution of the State, and all acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act, whether passed by a legislature of said Territory or by Congress, are hereby repealed.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I did not hear the order made for the consideration of this bill read, and I desire to know whether the bill is to be considered in the House regularly or in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. In the House.

Mr. ROGERS. By the order?

The SPEAKER. By the order.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask to have the order read again. I desire to make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. It will require unanimous consent to have the order again read.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask unanimous consent.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again read the order, as above.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this bill ought to receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole, as it carries an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, Congress and the country may contemplate with pride and satisfaction the fact that the time is not far distant when the last of our Territories will cease to exist as such, and the new relation of "State" will be assumed by membership in a Union which has stood the tests of more than a century the most eventful in the world's history.

Wyoming will, if admitted under the pending bill, be the forty-third State to come into the Union, and the thirtieth to enter since the original federation, following which are to come Idaho, New Mexico, Arizona, Oklahoma (which give promise of early preparation for statehood), Utah, and perhaps Alaska. There is every assurance that the last of our Territorial dependencies will become a State in the Union ere another decade shall pass, and when the calendar shall mark "A. D. 1900" we shall be a great Republic of half a hundred States, mighty in the achievements of war, to be sure, but far greater in the conquests of peace.

So the second century of our national existence will, in its first decade, give promise of growth in population, success in the pursuits of peace, prosperity to our vast industrial interests, progress in science and art, greater far than that of any preceding century of any nation in the world's history. Before the next half century passes we shall see the annexation, by natural attraction, of our neighbor on the north, with several ready-made States, abundantly equipped in all those elements which combine to insure strength and secure to all men equality and liberty in the highest and best sense.

Instead of a mere "commercial union" will come a political union, the conditions of, and considerations for, which will be mutual. Moreover, the invincible power and aggressiveness of our advanced civilization will extend southward until our "Union" will reach from the North Star to the Southern Cross! Then the Republic of North America will greet her sister Republics of South America across the Nicaragua canal. This may seem like an attempt on my part to assume the rôle of a prophet, but the conditions which have obtained in the great Northwest were all foretold by the founders of the Republic.

Immediately after the close of the Revolution, when several of the States were laying claim to the great outlying territory east of the Mississippi River, and north as well as south of the Ohio River, the patriotic State of Virginia, which seemed to have the stronger claim to the largest portion, yielded her claim for the benefit of all the States, imposing conditions that such territory should not be kept for any considerable time in a colonial condition, but stipulated in the contract under which the region northwest of the Ohio was ceded that when in any portion thereof 60,000 free inhabitants should assemble and become permanent citizens they should have absolute right to form for themselves a constitution and State government republican in form and should be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

The further condition was imposed that such territory should, in forming into States, comprise not less than three nor more than five. So we find that, in following the provisions of such contract, the great States of Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, and Illinois have come into the Union. Similar conditions have governed in the creation of the territory west of the Mississippi River, which was acquired from France, into States, and so we have the States of Missouri, Arkansas, Iowa, Wisconsin, Kansas, Minnesota, Nebraska, and the two Dakotas.

The creation and advent into the Union of the twenty-nine States which have come in since the original federation are but the fulfillment of the predictions, the realization of the prophetic utterances of our fathers when they laid the foundation of this Republic, a Republic which, as I have said, has successfully withstood the tests of more than a century, and grown stronger with each decade and mightier with the admission of each new State.

Our history from the beginning is, in its earliest chapters, replete with the utterances of the framers and defenders of our Constitution showing how clearly they were able to foresee the great future of our growth.

Territorial governments are a necessity, and in this very Congress we are earnestly desired to create such a government for Oklahoma, not because it is a desirable thing, but because the people are too few in number and too scant in resources to maintain a State government. "A Territory," Chief-Justice Taney said, "is required to become a State, and not to be held as a colony and governed by Congress with absolute authority." They are given rules and regulations by Congress in order that the people thereof may be protected in their persons and property and the sooner fit themselves for statehood. Yet it has been said, and all our past experience has demonstrated, that Territorial governments are contrary to the spirit of our American Constitution and are to be tolerated and continued only so long as the necessity exists.

There are now over a hundred thousand intelligent, law-abiding citizens in the Indian Territory and Oklahoma for whom we are going to create a Territorial government as a matter of necessity only. In a very few years they will be prepared for statehood, if encouraged as they deserve, and she will make one of the fairest in the Union.

The Territorial is a preparatory or probationary condition, out of which the people should at the earliest moment emerge into statehood.

Wyoming and Idaho have endured this condition of vassalage, the former since 1863; the latter was organized nearly five years earlier; both have borne a long probation; each has come and is here asking to be clothed with the habiliments of statehood in the Union; each is fully prepared to assume all the duties and obligations of such and presents the most satisfactory credentials. To me has been delegated the pleasant duty of presenting upon this floor the offering of Wyoming. It would seem almost unnecessary to occupy the attention of the House at any length, because I believe there is no substantial opposition to the immediate admission of the State from any source.

Within her own borders both the great political parties and all interests, public and private, seem to have united in the memorial which has been presented to Congress. Wyoming, is here asking for her constitutional right of admission to the Union and for representation upon this floor on an equality with her sister States, and her request has received the unanimous approval of your Committee on the Territories.

I have said there is no substantial opposition to the immediate admission of Wyoming from any source and that her request for admission has received the unanimous approval of your Committee on the Territories. Perhaps such assertions are too strongly stated. It will be conceded, however, that no negative vote was heard upon the proposition to report the bill with favorable recommendation, and I will not contend that individual objection to or criticism of any of the provisions in their constitution should subject a Representative to the charge of making substantial opposition to the admission of the State.

The suffrage article, being the sixth, as will be seen by reference to the report, provides that "the rights of citizens of the State of Wyoming to vote and hold office shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex" and "that both male and female citizens of this State shall equally enjoy all civil, political, and religious rights and privileges." It provides further that "no person shall have the right to vote who shall not be able to read the constitution of this State."

These are constitutional provisions not to be found in the fundamental law of any other State. They are novel and not yet new. As a Territory woman suffrage has obtained and existed for twenty years in their government. The people of the new State, men, women, and children, all, irrespective of political affiliations or religious prejudices, so far as we are informed, want the same principle ingrafted into their fundamental law. I honor them for it. He may not be a "bold, bad man" who will deny them statehood or argue against their capacity for self-government because they want to continue in statehood the principles under which, as a Territory, they have prospered and builded for themselves a State, but he does assume to battle against a sentiment which steadily through four decades or more has grown in our land until it has become a mighty power.

It will not be contended that any State now in the Union may not in legal manner amend its constitution by ingrafting thereon the same identical provisions quoted from the Wyoming constitution. Shall it be said, then, that in their organization they shall be denied the right to begin their career as a State by according to women the equal rights before the law granted and enjoyed by them during all their existence as a Territory? Will any man dare to stand up here before the people of this country, talking as we do to sixty millions or more of our equals, and assert that a constitution containing such a principle is unrepugnant in form? If yea, let him so declare, and then go hence and be no more forever, but politically of doubtful sanity.

I shall listen with interest, if not with shame, to the argument of any colleague upon this floor who will contend against the State which has, as a Territory, honored itself in sending as a Representative, term after term, my honored friend, Judge CAREY, to whom I will yield the easy task of answering any objection which may be urged upon that line.

Wyoming comes with the ripe experience of over twenty-one years of Territorial rule; her domain embraces 98,000 square miles—62,000,000 acres; she will be the eighth State in the Union in respect of area, an area equal to New York, New Jersey, Kentucky, and Delaware; her national resources are vast and varied; her actual wealth is not less than $125,000,000; her railroad property is shown to be not less than $25,000,000; while she has expended in irrigation works and improvements full ten millions; $40,000,000 is the estimated value of the live stock grazing upon improved farms and ranches aggregating more than fifteen millions in value. We are convinced that her developed mines represent fully fifteen millions more.

Two and a half millions represent less than the value of the churches, schools, city, county, and Territorial property. She boasts a better capitol building than can be found in fifteen of the older States, erected at a cost of $375,000. She will doubtless have several Government buildings conveniently located soon after her admission, certainly so if the present Delegate comes back as her representative in the Senate, as is likely to be the case if the fitness of things is to be observed. The present total indebtedness of Wyoming is only $320,000, which is nearly equalled by the funds in the treasury. Her national banks, nine in number, in 1888 employed an aggregate of $1,175,000, with a surplus of $213,000. The mining resources of this new State are wonderful. They embrace gold, silver, lead, tin, asbestos, mica, magnesium, sulphur, graphite, kaolin, fire-clay, marble, salt, and it is shown that coal, petroleum, iron, and soda exist in almost inexhaustible quantities.

The oil-bearing area is said to be 300 miles in length, while its coal area is known to cover 30,000 square miles. Her population is not less than 110,000. The population of each of ten of the great States, which I will name, at the time of admission was much less: Ohio when admitted had 45,000; Indiana, 63,000; Mississippi, 35,000; Illinois, 35,000; Alabama, 40,000; Missouri, 66,000; Oregon, 45,000; and Kansas, Nebraska, and Colorado each had but 100,000.

The vote cast in 1888 at the election for her present Delegate was 18,210. The increase of vote year by year has been marked. A comparison with the votes cast at Presidential elections at various periods in the history of several of the States will prove interesting. I quote from the remarks of Wyoming's Delegate made before the Committee on Territories:

Wisconsin Territory at election preceding admission cast 20,318 votes, admitted with two Representatives, and she cast first Congressional election 24,600. Iowa admitted with two Representatives, who were elected with total vote of 20,964.

Kansas cast at second Congressional election after admission 15,272. Nebraska cast first Congressional election subsequent to admission 14,710. Colorado cast at election previous to admission 17,100.

California at her first State election, after a most bitter political fight when the selection of governor, judiciary, and other State officers, including United States Senators, was dependent upon the result, cast only 12,875 votes.

In the great debate over the admission of Oregon and Kansas it was not claimed that more than 10,121 votes had ever been cast in the former and 13,289 votes in the latter Territory. The votes rejected as well as those counted were included in these totals.

At almost every Presidential election up to and including that of 1872 there were from three to five States that did not have as many male voters as there were in Wyoming in 1888.

The new State also makes a most favorable exhibit in her postal affairs.

I am tempted to quote briefly from the report of Professor Meade, the Territorial engineer, to illustrate the wonderful push and industry of the people in the matter of reclaiming and developing her agricultural resources, resulting, as is shown, in reclaiming fully 2,500,000 acres, making it to bear abundant fruit. Professor Meade says:

Wyoming stands third in extent of irrigated lands and in number and mileage of irrigation canals. More than $10,000,000 are invested in irrigation ditches and canals, and over $15,000,000 have been expended in the reclamation of desert lands. The irrigated districts, as to extent, are equal to two-thirds of Italy and are greater than those of France and Spain combined. The lands now reclaimed would, if divided, make 30,000 80-acre farms and, if provided with transportation facilities, would furnish employment and support for more than one-quarter of a million of people. Fully 10,000,000 acres can be reclaimed by irrigation if proper measures are taken for storing and distributing the water. These lands are not only enormously productive, but their agricultural value is enhanced by contiguity of over 30,000,000 acres of valuable grazing lands. The irrigable land of this Territory equals in extent the combined irrigation of Egypt and Italy, the agricultural area of which supports over 10,000,000 people. Taken in connection with the grazing land, its area and productive value are above the States in the Mississippi Valley.

In the volume and distribution of her water supply Wyoming takes the first place among the States and Territories of the arid belt. Within her boundaries are the sources of three of the great rivers of the continent—the Missouri, Colorado, and Columbia—streams crossing the continent in three directions and emptying into the Gulf of Mexico, Gulf of California, and the Pacific Ocean. These three great water courses have their origin within a circle of which the radius is less than 10 miles. Six hundred natural water ways have their water diverted in irrigation. Four great rivers cross her borders: the Platte on the east, the Big Horn on the north, the Snake on the west, and the Greene on the south. Their tributaries penetrate all parts of her vast extent and are fed from the melting snows of a mountain area which covers over 20,000,000 acres. There are over 3,000 irrigation ditches, with a total length, not counting laterals, of nearly 5,000 miles. The record ditches cover 2,106,180 acres of land.

I have hastily referred to these things in passing, not in the belief that any gentleman is in doubt or needs convincing, for I believe that with one voice the people of the United States, through their Representatives on this floor, are ready to say amen to the prayer of Wyoming for admission. They have in an orderly and authoritative manner expressed their desire to be clothed with the power and charged with the duties of statehood. They have proceeded in a justifiable and regular way to place themselves in condition for admission.

Their constitution and State government, duly adopted and organized, are republican in form, and all the conditions as to area, population, production, resources, morals, and lawful and orderly practices assure the existence and continuance of a permanent State government.

Upon such a showing, clothed as she is in all that lies at the foundation of every prosperous State, I am proud to bid Wyoming welcome to the sisterhood of States! We are engaged in a great transaction when we admit a new State to the Union. By our act we tie a knot that, as our experience has illustrated, can never be cut by the sword! We pin a star upon our flag that the torch of war can never obliterate! We are erecting a defense stronger than all the projected coast defenses combined can ever be made, more invincible than armies and navies. France has within a few years expended over $775,000,000 in fortifying Paris, and yet all engineers confess or claim their fortifications are worthless because of later improvements in engines of destruction. We will expend our millions in internal improvements, in encouraging our own industries, and in enlarging our own commerce, and so command and supply the markets of the world with the products of our own industries.

Germany expends over $202,000,000 annually on her army, while her Kaisers and Bismarcks, in chorus with Czars and Emperors, for a decade have assured the world that the peace of Europe is secured; yet Germany has for the past eight years increased her army expenses at an average rate of nearly forty-three millions per year. We employ our army in the pursuits of peace, and in two decades have, through our industrial campaigns, increased our aggregate wealth by more than $40,000,000,000. European nations take three millions of the most robust and capable of their sons from farm and shop, where they would be self-supporting and help to bear the legitimate burdens of state, and place them in barracks, where they become not only non-producers, but where they consume, waste, and destroy the productions of those who toil. We encourage our sons to build for themselves new States, to advancement in education, arts, science, invention, and agriculture, and in all the pursuits of peace.

European powers have manufactured wars at the behest of toppling monarchies, in order that their dynasties might be bolstered up through the sacrifices of blind, patriotic impulse and love for national prestige, while our institutions have, year by year, grown stronger because they are founded upon "right," not power, upon the doctrine that "right makes might" rather than the hateful sentiment that "might makes right." This Administration will be illustrious in history because in its outset four new members were added to the family of States, with promise that two and perhaps four others may soon follow. Under its wise direction will be inaugurated commercial relations with our sister Republics of South America, the re-establishment of our merchant marine, with probable direct railway communication to the very heart of the new Republic of Brazil.

Were ever the conquests of war to be compared with the achievements of peace such as these? The policy of all the foreign powers means wasteful war, while ours means peace and plenty. We need no standing army. The world knows that since we were able to achieve independence for 3,000,000 in the struggle against British tyranny and King George III, a hundred years ago, and to maintain the Union and constitutional liberty against British sympathy and a gigantic civil war, unparalleled in history, seventy years later, coming out from the later struggle, as we did, with a Union and a people stronger and more united than ever before in our own history, we have nothing to fear from foes without or foes within.

It has been well said that "no foreign power, even in its nightmares, dreams of waging war upon our country. On the contrary, every nation on earth is on its knees every morning praying that our Government will not attack it. Our resources in men and money establish this as a fair conclusion that no European nation could float a flag five years if it made war on one of our forts. None but France is brave enough and the French are too friendly. In case of an attack by any, a European war would at once result and millions of American soldiers would swarm over the little territory of any European power like the locusts of Egypt. Our prestige in this comes not from our rank as a military power, but rather from the fact that we have been and are progressive people, engaged in building States rather than maintaining armies and navies.

Let us then encourage the new States to come into the Union as soon and as fast as they may come under proper conditions, for with every new State comes new strength, an aggregate of homes, wherein abide peace and industry, virtue and temperance, in which rests the absolute security of our Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan). The gentleman has twenty-five minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the passage of the bill reported by the majority of the Committee on Territories in favor of the admission of Wyoming into the Union. I propose to give the reasons which control my judgment. I believe, in the first place, that there have been gross irregularities attending the preliminary proceedings under which this constitution was formed and under which the admission is sought. I believe, secondly, that no evidence has been furnished to the committee, nor can be to the House, that the Territory of Wyoming has the population requisite for admission into the Union. I believe, in the third place, that there have been incorporated into the constitution of Wyoming features relating to the subject of female suffrage and the right of females to hold office under the government which, in my judgment, are antagonistic to republican institutions and were never contemplated plated by the fathers in the formation of this Government. I hope that I may be able reasonably to demonstrate the truth of these propositions. In what I shall say I am actuated by no feeling of opposition to the people of the Territory, nor to their admission into the Union when they are sufficiently qualified for it.

It may be well, Mr. Speaker, at the outset to recur to some of the principles set forth in the Constitution of the United States which have been supposed to govern and to some which do govern and control the administration of the affairs of those areas of country which we usually describe under the name of Territories, and at the same time those principles which are to regulate and control our conduct as Representatives of the people in properly admitting them as members of the Federal Union. The Constitution of the United States, Mr. Speaker, is remarkably silent upon this subject. For many years it was supposed that the provision in the Constitution which had reference to the disposal of the territory and other property of the United States and the regulation of its affairs had respect to the "Territories" of the United States. That clause is found in the second paragraph of the third section and fourth article of the Constitution, and is in these words:

The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

But when we examine that provision in connection with that other provision of the Constitution which gives to the Federal Government exclusive jurisdiction in the territory which we know as the District of Columbia and in the forts, dock-yards, and arsenals of the Government, we see that the difference in the language shows that the framers of the Constitution never contemplated that that clause should be regarded as conferring the exercise of governmental authority over the Territories. The provision concerning the District of Columbia and concerning forts and arsenals is found in the seventeenth paragraph of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution. The language is:

Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation over such District, and like authority over such forts, arsenals, etc.

The last clause cited refers to legislation and confers the power of exclusive legislation. The former provision quoted uses language applicable to the territory and other property of the United States as property.

This subject came before the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Scott vs. Sanford (19 How., 393). The court in that case gave a history of this clause and showed in that history that it was intended to refer only to the territory of the United States belonging to the United States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and to that territory simply under its character of property. In that case the court traced the power of the General Government over the Territories to the inevitable consequence of the right to acquire territory; and the right to acquire territory, it was held, was conferred by the right given to admit new States.

Chief-Justice Taney in his review of this subject shows that the whole control which we exercise over what are known as the Territories of the United States is merely implied power, implied as a matter of necessity, and derived from the clause in the Constitution which provides that—

New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union.

We have a right, then, to acquire territory—not to be held, to use the language of the Supreme Court, as a colony, and governed by Congress with absolute authority, but to be held by the United States until it is in a suitable condition to become a State, on an equal footing with the other States.

The Chief-Justice in this opinion shows—and with the views therein expressed I am in full accord—that the Constitution intended that these Territories, as long as they remained Territories, should be governed in such a way as ultimately to fit them to become States; and I believe, Mr. Speaker, that as long as they are in that Territorial condition, however small the number of people who may dwell within the fixed area which we may prescribe for a Territory, those people should be allowed the very largest share of self-government compatible with their subordination to the Constitution of the United States.

But, sir, I believe at the same time that the right of admitting them as States of this Union is a matter of sound discretion on the part of Congress, and inasmuch as the Constitution has been perfectly silent as to the regulations which should precede their admission, I think that when we come to exercise that discretion it should not be exercised in a spirit of caprice, but should be exercised with wisdom, caution, and deliberation.

I have said this much, Mr. Speaker, because we have before us not merely the bill now under consideration for the admission of Wyoming, but we have also upon the Calendar a bill for the admission of Idaho, and there are two or three other similar bills which have been introduced which may or may not receive favorable consideration at the hands of the committee and may or may not come before the House. It is well that when we have to consider the question of the admission of so many States we should understand clearly and carefully the limitations which the Constitution prescribes on that subject, and the regulations which precedent and the experience of the past suggest to us.

When the Union was formed there were but thirteen States entering that Union. Twenty-nine have since been admitted. The great majority of these States were admitted after Congress had passed enabling acts authorizing the people to assemble in convention to form State constitutions and apply for admission. This is unquestionably the regular method.

Mr. BAKER. If the gentleman desires to be exactly accurate as to the number, I can assist him in that respect.

Mr. BARNES. I do not desire any assistance whatever; when I need it I will call for it.

Mr. BAKER. The fact is that only ten States came in without enabling acts, and ten in the regular way—

Mr. BARNES. I know—

Mr. BAKER. So do I.

Mr. BARNES. I do not desire any assistance on this subject; when I need it from the gentleman I will call for it.

Mr. BAKER. I think you need it now.

Mr. BARNES. Well, there is a difference of opinion on that subject. As I occupy the floor, I propose to exercise my privilege of expressing my own opinion upon the question.

I say—and I repeat it—I have looked into this question with some degree of care and caution; and if there is one thing about which I am careful it is never to misstate a historical fact. I say that in the majority of cases, so far as my reading goes, enabling acts were passed. In other cases, where the people of the Territories assembled in convention they assembled under Territorial acts, not under enabling acts of Congress; and when they met under Territorial acts they framed their constitutions in accordance with the acts that had been passed by the Territorial Legislature.

There are some few special cases, such as the case, for example, of Maine, which was carved out of Massachusetts, where this was not necessary. There was the special case of Kentucky, which was organized and formed under an act of the Legislature of Virginia. There have been a few cases of that kind; but I say that the general rule has been that Congress has in the first instance passed an act authorizing and enabling the people of the Territory to meet in a convention and form a constitution, and when that has not been done the general rule in the other cases has been that Territorial Legislatures have passed acts providing for constitutional conventions. That is my reading of history.

But where Congress failed to pass enabling acts, why, sir, in every such case, except in a few isolated instances such as I have mentioned, the Territorial Legislature passed an act under which an election was held for delegates to a convention to form a constitution; and when those delegates had assembled in convention they formed a constitution and submitted it usually to a vote of ratification by the people. All such constitutions were formed in accordance with the forms of law.

In my judgment nothing but the most extraordinary circumstances would justify a departure from this rule. In the case before us the governor of Wyoming issued a proclamation under which delegates were selected and assembled in convention and formed a constitution. So far as I have been enabled to study this question, there is but one other instance in American history clearly and distinctly made where this was done, and that was in the case of California. In that case, it must be recollected, however, that the territory had just been acquired by conquest. It was in 1848. We had just terminated the war with Mexico. Gold had been discovered in California. Vast hordes of people were rushing in there. The country there was under the control of a military governor.

Our whole country was disturbed and agitated—rocked from center to circumference, as it were—by the discussion of the slavery question. Under the military proclamation of General Riley a government was formed in California; the people assembled in convention and formed a State government. Mr. Clay, when he came to Washington in 1850, came as the great pacificator of the country. This government in California had been organized for a year. Mr. Clay proposed, in that period of agitation and disturbance, when the country was threatened with civil war, as a measure of peace, as a measure of compromise, with the hope of adjusting the differences between the North and the South, that California be admitted; and under these extraordinary circumstances it was done—as an extraordinary measure, as a peace measure, as a measure of compromise; and the precedent which was set in the case of California can not control until you find a case presenting like circumstances.

Why, Mr. Speaker, necessity may justify anything; but in the case of Wyoming there is no necessity justifying any extraordinary measure. How different the situation of the country now from what it was when California was admitted. There is no turmoil; there is no strife; there is no confusion. Profound peace reigns throughout the land, from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico. Yet with this solitary precedent, constituting one case alone out of twenty-nine—a case surrounded by extraordinary circumstances which never before existed and I trust will never exist again—it is sought to admit this State of Wyoming into the Union.

Upon this question, in regard to assemblies of the people held in this informal way, without the sanction of law, for the purpose of establishing governments, I desire to read for a few moments from the argument submitted by Daniel Webster in the celebrated case of Luther vs. Borden, the case growing out of the Dorr rebellion. Said Mr. Webster:

It has been said by the opposing counsel that the people can get together, call themselves so many thousands, and establish whatever government they please; but others must have the same right. We have, then, a stormy South American liberty, supported by arms to-day and crushed by arms to-morrow. Our theory places a beautiful face on liberty and makes it powerful for good, producing no tumults. When it is necessary to ascertain the will of the people the Legislature must provide the means of ascertaining it.

The Constitution of the United States was established in this way: It was recommended to the States to send delegates to a convention. They did so. Then it was recommended that the States should ascertain the will of the people. Nobody suggested any other mode. The opposite counsel have cited the examples of the different States in which constitutions have been altered. Only two provided for conventions, and yet conventions have been held in many of them. But how? Always these conventions were called together by the Legislature, and no single constitution has ever been altered by means of a convention gotten up by mass meetings.

There must be—

Says Mr. Webster, and there is the germ of all he said—there must be an authentic mode of ascertaining the public will somehow and somewhere.

When these conventions are called for the purpose of forming a constitution they must do so under that mode by which the public will is shown somewhere or somehow. That will is expressed by Congress in an enabling act and by the people expressed through the Territorial Legislature. When you do not do it in this mode you violate the Constitution. You call the people together in a tumultuous assemblage. That is the case in Wyoming.

Mr. HILL. What is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. BARNES. I am reading from 7 Howard, in the case of Luther vs. Borden.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Webster is speaking there of a convention called to set up a constitution where there is another government in the State. Does the gentleman think that is a parallel case?

Mr. BARNES. I do, and I will tell you why. There was a government in Wyoming set up by the United States in accordance with the Constitution of the United States—a government legal and constitutional, just as much so as the government in Rhode Island. The cases are perfectly parallel, and the argument of Mr. Webster applies here in the case of Wyoming just as much as it did in the case of Rhode Island, which he was then arguing. When this governor of Wyoming attempted, under his proclamation, to call the convention together it was without form of law. It was in the absence of the authentic mode which Mr. Webster said was necessary, which was the only mode known to American law and American liberty.

If I had time to cite that brief in full I would show the position taken by Mr. Webster in that argument was a position in accordance with English history by which every change had been made in the British Government.

Now, what was the way in which it was done in Wyoming? I have the proceedings here contained in the memorial in this case. Why, certain commissioners of the several counties, upon whose suggestion I do not know, because it is not disclosed in the memorial, asked the governor to issue a proclamation for a convention of the people. The governor thereupon issued a call for a convention for the purpose of forming a constitution. Upon this bare suggestion he issues his proclamation, and there are some extraordinary features in that proclamation to which I desire to call attention.

He recites in the preamble his authority, and what is his authority? His authority is simply that of the board of commissioners. It is not done under the law. It is not in pursuance of any act of the Legislature or of the Congress of the United States, but merely at the suggestion of these boards of county commissioners. Why, sir, they had no more right to suggest than you or I had. I could have suggested, or Mr. CAREY, the Delegate from Wyoming, could have suggested. He shakes his head, I see, and says, "No." You are too modest, but you were behind the scenes while the governor suggested it. [Laughter.]

But the governor, in his proclamation, says:

I suggest that in organizing a State government preparatory to admission the provision of the Senate bill—

Which had been introduced, but which had never become a law—should be followed, as nearly as may be possible, and in pursuance thereof the following recommendations are hereby made.

Then he proposes and recommends there shall be fifty-five delegates, and they shall be divided among the several districts which he has located by his own act throughout this Territory. When they assemble it is not provided these delegates shall be qualified under any existing law, under any constitution, under any form of government, but the character and fitness of the delegates to be chosen, it is stated in the proclamation, are, in fact, of greater importance than the manner of their selection. I have always understood the manner of election was a question of law, and as to character and fitness the legally qualified electors were to decide.

But here was this governor, with the aid of the chief-justice and the secretary of the Territory, who divided this Territory without law, without authority—no more authority than the Committee on the Territories would have had, nor I would have had, nor any member of this House would have had; not one whit more—assigning the number of delegates to the districts, and providing, they say, for their assembling to form a State government. Such a case is without precedent in American history.

He says in this proclamation:

The character and fitness of the delegates to be chosen are in fact of greater importance than the manner of their selection, and if the citizens of any county generally prefer to elect their delegates by some equitable method other than that hereinbefore prescribed, it is believed that the delegates so chosen will be recognized and admitted to seats in the convention.

It is without any authority of law. It does not even have the form of law. They were not governed by any particular manner; but if they had character and fitness it was believed they would be admitted. Who is to judge of the character and fitness of the delegates? Who is to judge between the mode of selection recommended in the proclamation or some other mode or modes which citizens in different counties may prefer?

Mr. CAREY. Will the gentleman from Georgia permit a question?

Mr. BARNES. Certainly.

Mr. CAREY. I would like to ask the gentleman, since he is arguing now on constitutional grounds, by what authority the convention framed the Constitution under which we are now living.

Mr. BARNES. Why, Mr. Speaker, Daniel Webster answers that, and if the gentleman had listened to the quotation I have just made he would not have needed to ask the question.

Mr. CAREY. I was unable to hear what the gentleman read.

Mr. BARNES. I refer the gentleman to the argument of Daniel Webster in that case. He answered that question fully in the brief to which I have referred.

Mr. STRUBLE. I would like to interrupt the gentleman from Georgia on another point, and that is as to the division of this Territory into districts, to make a suggestion which my friend will recognize to be true, that these officers to whom he refers were just such as were suggested by a bill reported by the Senate and placed upon its Calendar in the Fiftieth Congress; and, while I do not claim that that is authority of law, yet I think it is only due that that much should be said in explanation of the action to which the gentleman has adverted.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let me suggest in that connection that the failure to pass that bill would argue that they were not authorized to do what they did.

Mr. BARNES. A sufficient answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa is the objection I am making, that this was done without any authority of law whatever. I do not care for the suggestions which may have been embodied in a bill which did not pass. They do not afford warrant of law for such action. I do not care for suggestions which entered into the minds of men, even if recognized as the ablest in any section of the country. They come without the sanctity of law, and that is the only point I am making, and the gentleman can not deny it. The whole thing, Mr. Speaker, according to the language of Daniel Webster, was nothing more nor less than a "tumultuous assemblage of the people" combined together at the suggestion of the governor, who sees fit to say that it does not matter how the delegates are selected provided that they have the requisite character and fitness.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman from Georgia will permit me to suggest in this connection, it should be said that some of these delegates were elected at county boards, some by joint action of the two political parties in the counties contesting, and the gentleman from Wyoming can inform the House as to the correctness of the statement.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I must now decline to be interrupted any further. I have yielded as far as the limited time at my disposal will allow, and I have attempted to dispose of the questions which have been suggested in their order. This brief of Mr. Webster, to which I have already referred, contains a good many old things which would be of value to gentlemen if they would consider them in this discussion.

Mr. STRUBLE. Perhaps their age would not improve them when referred to a subject of this kind.

Mr. BARNES. The difficulty with my friend here is that he wants new things, and it does not matter how the new things are brought about, whether they plainly violate the law or not, provided they are new. I prefer to go to a higher source for my authorities. Let me remind the gentleman of an old saying that is very true, and it is well for him and some of my colleagues also to recall that saying, "that change is not always reform;" and when gentlemen are disposed to change from principles of law which were laid down by Daniel Webster in an argument like this which I have cited, they are very apt to go greatly astray.

Now, the difficulty in the case of this Wyoming election and the assembling of this convention is, as Daniel Webster said, that under the American method there must be an authentic mode of ascertaining the popular will somewhere or somehow. But in this case there was no such authentic mode of determining it. It is wanting in all of the elements, in the very foundation of the convention itself, which is without warrant or authority. What followed? What could follow as a natural consequence?

Why, Mr. Speaker, we were told that there were eighteen thousand and odd votes cast at the last election for my friend Mr. CAREY, in November, 1888; we were told also that the population of that country was rapidly increasing; that it was a growing region; population pouring into it from all parts of the country. And yet when this convention, for which these people are represented to be crying like a hungry infant for its mother's milk—when this convention was to be voted for they could turn out but 8,000 votes, of men and women combined, for that bill at that time; and when they did turn out there were over 1,923 votes against it. The people regarded the whole performance as a mere farce at the time.

But let me call your attention for a moment to some of the literature on this subject. Let me direct your attention to an article headed, "The banner town of Crook County," taken from the Sundance Gazette, published in Crook County, Wyoming, immediately after the election:

One of the arguments used before the Legislature in favor of Weston County is that Newcastle is the banner town of Crook County, and the three hundred-odd votes credited to Newcastle at the constitutional election are pointed to with great pride as proof of the assertion. We should think that that particular election would be given a wide berth, especially by Newcastlers. There was no election there on that day, but three persons, each of whom we could name, went into a back room and conducted a cigar-box election. No one else was present, and these men marked the tickets and dropped them into the slot of the cigar-box.

How 7 votes came to be cast against the constitution arose from the fact that one of the parties, after nearly all the tickets had been cast, exclaimed, "I'm d—n tired of voting for the same man all the time; I'm going to vote for the other fellow." And he accordingly dropped in 7 votes with "Yes" scratched out. The cigar-box, the ballots, and the tally-sheet giving the result were sent here, the same canvassed at this point, and with the other but bona-fide returns forwarded to Cheyenne, where they were duly recorded. And that is how Newcastle came to be the "banner town" of Crook County. The above particulars were related to us by one of the trio who conducted the cigar-box election, and a gentleman whose word is as good as gold. As there was no color of legality about the election in Crook County, the scheme was devised and carried out more in a spirit of levity than otherwise, and it was not thought the returns would be forwarded to Cheyenne and made a part of the record.

Mr. HILL. Is that the kind of political matter you introduce into a report?

Mr. BARNES. There is a sample of the votes cast at this election. Is it a wonder that any such consequences follow?

Mr. STRUBLE. Let me suggest—

Mr. BARNES. I decline to be interrupted any further. My time is too limited.

Mr. STRUBLE. It is unfortunate that the gentleman should undertake to make that statement in regard to this election, and refuse to allow a single suggestion.

Mr. BARNES. I am at liberty to state my thoughts in my own way, and I have said that I could not, in my limited time, permit further interruption.

Mr. STRUBLE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CAREY. I know the gentleman from Georgia is fair, for I have had many conversations with him; but before he proceeds further I would like to ask him to state to the House where he obtained that evidence.

Mr. BARNES. Why, from this newspaper, of course.

Mr. CAREY. From the newspaper?

Mr. BARNES. Yes.

Mr. CAREY. Newspaper of one town fighting about the relative size of the town as compared with another; and the gentleman puts that in as evidence.

Mr. BARNES. I do. There is the evidence. It could have readily occurred at such an election. I will add what Webster said in his argument already quoted, that there is no chance of punishing anybody at such an election for bribery, for perjury, or for a repetition of his vote. There is no law which could reach a man guilty of such an offense at such an election. And what is cited there is but a fair sample, as I believe, of what took place in other parts of the Territory.

It is a fair sample of what is in evidence as to this election. And what was done at this point could have been done anywhere else in the Territory, at any other precinct in Wyoming. It is pretty strong evidence that the whole thing must have been a fixed-up job, for it so appears on its face.

This convention, it should be remembered, was held, bear in mind, and closed its labors on the 30th day of September, and the pretended constitution under this pretended election was submitted to the people, a great many of whom must have regarded it as a farce, thirty-five days thereafter. Not a soul could be punished for bribery, for perjury, for corruption, or for repetition of votes at the election, and yet in the face of all that, in the face of the fact that here was a rapidly growing Territory, and although they had 18,000 votes at the preceding election for Delegate to Congress, the best that could be done here was 8,000 votes of men and women together, and drawn out under the most extraordinary inducements to vote, of whom 1,923 were opposed to it.

This election had not merely no form of law, but it is an absurd and ridiculous farce, and if it could be subjected to judicial investigation it would never stand the investigation of legal scrutiny or legal trial.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to know how much time I have.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GROSVENOR in the chair). The gentleman has twenty-three minutes, according to the information of the Chair.

Mr. BARNES. There are two other points to which I desire to devote some attention, and I will therefore hasten on. One bears on the subject of population.

Now, I admit, Mr. Speaker, that there is no fixed rule which has ever been prescribed by law as to the population which a State should have before admission into the Union. There is no provision to be found in the Constitution of the United States as to what is the requisite number of people who shall be found as inhabitants of a Territory preparatory to its admission into the Union. But Mr. Douglas said, in the course of the debate on the Kansas question (and he was probably more familiar with this Territorial subject than any other of our American statesmen), that while we had never adhered to any fixed rule it was a good rule to say that we should require that the people requisite to entitle a Territory to admission into the Union as a State should be the number which would entitle it to one Representative on the floor of this House.

In the ordinance of 1787 there was a compact entered into between Virginia and the Congress of the Confederate States, and under that it was provided that, while Congress might, if it saw fit, admit a State with less than 60,000 inhabitants, if the proposed State carved out of the ceded territory had 60,000 it should be considered as entitled to admission into the Union. Now, the unit of representation at that time was about 30,000, and yet our fathers in 1787, in this compact in the days of their weakness, provided that in the absence of other provisions the requisite number should be 60,000.

Now, my friend from New York [Mr. BAKER] has referred to what were the facts in the different States. I have here a table showing what was the representative ratio prior to the admission of each State into the Union, with the exception of the four last admitted, and what was its population at the time of its admission, from Vermont, admitted 1791, to Colorado, admitted 1876.

* Estimated.

I find on running through a few of these cases that Vermont, which was the first State admitted into the Union, in 1791, when the requisite population at that time under the unit of representation was 33,000, had at the time of admission 85,425 people. I find that Kentucky, which was admitted in 1792, when the unit of representation was still 33,000, had a population of 73,677. I find that Ohio, then a new State just emerging into existence, which was admitted in 1802, when the requisite population was still 33,000, had a population of 45,365. I find that Mississippi, which was admitted in 1817, when the requisite population was 35,000, had a population of 75,512. I find, as I run down the list, that California in 1850, when the requisite population was 93,423, had a population of 120,000.

I find that in all these cases down the list the requisite population always was very near to the unit of representation—frequently it was double; always approximate—and that in these cases it seems to have acquired the force of rule and regulation which accompanies legal enactment. In our own time since 1876 we have still adhered to this rule. Why, the last Congress admitted North and South Dakota, Montana, and Washington. Montana and Washington had a population, as I understand and believe, of 175,000. When we came to North and South Dakota it was claimed by the gentlemen who are now the majority of the Committee on the Territories that all Dakota had a population of 600,000, of which there were about 200,000 in North Dakota and about 400,000 in South Dakota. In admitting those States we required the requisite unit of population. That unit was 151,912 under the census of 1880.

Now, we are told in reference to Wyoming that she is in a fit condition to come into the Union. A fit condition to come into the Union, when at this vote for this convention only 8,000 people could be summoned and dragged to the polls? A fit condition, when that vote, it is to be borne in mind, counted both females and males? A fit condition, when, according to the vote that was cast for General CAREY in November, 1888, when the total was 18,010, we bear in mind that both men and women were counted? If we could estimate the population in proportion of five to one, it would be about 90,000. But both men and women voted, and if one-third were women, leaving 12,000 male voters, according to the usual rate the population would not exceed sixty to seventy thousand people. Now, we have seen that by the last census the unit of representation was fixed at 151,912. Apply the general rule, under the ordinance of 1787, she ought to have at least 300,000 people; but adopting the most favorable rule she ought to have at the time of admission 150,000 inhabitants. This is a small number, considering the present population of the Union, to give reasonable assurance of a State; but we have no reliable information whatever. It is all mere matter of opinion, and there is nothing on which opinion is so loose as concerning the number of a large assemblage of people, even when we look at them face to face; how much worse when scattered over a vast area like Wyoming, containing 98,000 square miles. It is true that Mr. CAREY said, in his opinion, they had a population of 110,000 inhabitants; but this was an extravagant estimate, having existence in a fervid imagination. It is the population which he hopes to expect to see in the future. I have heard these gentlemen, Delegates from the different Territories, before the Territorial Committee.

When I listen to one of them separately describing in glowing terms the vast resources and the wonderful growth of population of his Territory, I have almost felt tempted to emigrate, but when I have heard them all I am left in so much doubt that I conclude after all there is no place like home.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BARNES. Certainly.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I notice by the vote given the present Delegate in Congress from Wyoming that the entire vote was 18,010.

Mr. BARNES. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Has the gentleman, as a member of the Committee on Territories, any information he can give to this House as to what proportion of female votes are contained in that 18,000?

Mr. BARNES. No, sir. I must say that is one of the great disadvantages under which the Committee on Territories labored. There never has been any definite information in that regard. There have been estimates submitted and guess-work, but we have not been able by any rule to get at the substantial facts.

In most of these other cases, when these other Territories were admitted, we had something with reference to population which had been ascertained by census and upon which we could rely, but when we come to Wyoming we find it is all guess-work, and, in the absence of information, the Committee on Territories are called upon to make the best guess they can, and as I have been far removed from Yankee-land and have not the faculty of guessing, I find it impossible to obtain the desired information. [Laughter.] We say "reckon" in our country, and therefore we calculate.

Mr. WILSON, of Washington. The reckoning was all right in reference to Washington, was it not?

Mr. BARNES. No; I don't think it was altogether right. I think there was some guessing there, too.

Mr. WILSON, of Washington. We had 60,000 votes in the last election for one member, while you in Georgia get in three members on a far less number of votes.

Mr. BARNES. Well, we get them on the requisite number, and we will not go into an argument of that question now.

Mr. WILSON, of Washington. You do not cast the votes at the polls.

Mr. BARNES. There is no use in talking about that now. I have always learned when I have any business before me to go on and attend to that, and not to be drawn off into other matters. As to Georgia votes and Georgia population, I will discuss that when a proper time arrives.

Mr. WILSON, of Washington. I do not suppose you will be drawn off on that subject.

Mr. BARNES. No, sir; I will not.

Mr. WILSON, of Washington. You did not admit us until, like Paul on his way to Damascus, you were struck by lightning.

Mr. BARNES. Well, I do not expect to be struck by lightning now, and if I am I know it will not come from the gentleman. [Laughter.] Just let me go on with my argument. I have certain business before me and I want to attend to it.

Mr. WILSON, of Washington. I will listen to you with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. BARNES. I hope you will. But we do not want any "lightning" in this matter; we do not want to be diverted from the question at issue.

Mr. WILSON, of Washington. Well, you had referred to Washington, and I wanted to reply.

Mr. BARNES. Well, I had referred to it in very pleasant terms. Before passing let me say the gentleman and myself misunderstood each other some moments ago. I had given Washington full credit for having more than the requisite unit population at the time of admission.

The gentleman certainly did not hear me or he would not have interrupted me on this point, and I did not understand his inquiry when he asked whether the reckoning was all right concerning Washington. In fact I did not, in the midst of the interruption, understand fully the nature and scope of his inquiry. Had I understood him I would have promptly answered, what I had previously stated and what I again repeat, that I believe Washington had more than the requisite population at the time of her admission.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is another feature, aside from the question of population, to which I object. I object to that provision in the constitution of Wyoming which bears on the subject of female suffrage. My time is getting short and it is cut especially short by these interruptions.

Mr. WILSON, of Washington. I will move to extend it.

Mr. BARNES. You are not the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Washington. Well, I can make the motion.

Mr. BARNES. I do not know that it would be carried. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Speaker, on the subject of suffrage, sections 1 and 2, article 6, of this constitution provide as follows:

The rights of citizens of the State of Wyoming to vote and hold office shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex. Both male and female citizens of this State shall equally enjoy all civil, political, and religious rights and privileges. Every citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years and upwards who has resided in the State or Territory one year and in the county wherein such residence is located sixty days next preceding any election shall be entitled to vote at such election, except as herein otherwise provided.

In a previous part of the constitution we are furnished with two clauses which I suppose are intended to form the logical precedent of the conclusions which are embodied in the two provisions I have read. In the declaration of rights, section 2, article 1, we are told that—

In their inherent right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness all members of the human race are equal. Since equality in the enjoyment of natural and civil rights is made sure only through political equality, the laws of the State affecting the political rights or privileges of its citizens shall be without distinction of race, color, sex, or any circumstance or condition whatsoever other than individual incompetency or unworthiness, duly ascertained by a court of competent jurisdiction.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that the right of suffrage is an inherent right. I believe that the inherent rights are those which are set forth in the Declaration of Independence: life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and wherever a right is an inherent right I am entitled, and everybody else is entitled, to an equal share in that right. But when it comes to the exercise of suffrage, suffrage is a method, a means, by which we exercise political power, by which we confer political power; and, as a means and a method of exercising political power, it is conferred by the State upon those individuals (at least in theory) who are presumed to be best fitted for the general welfare of the State to exercise it.

But to say that suffrage is an inherent right, like life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, would be to say that all political powers, like those inherent rights, belong equally to each individual, to man and woman equally without regard to sex, to men and children equally without regard to age except where infancy imposes a natural disability for the time being. So far as inherent rights are concerned, we are entitled to share them equally, but when it comes to political rights it is impossible that we can share them equally.

The Speaker must necessarily exercise more political power than the individual member upon the floor. The governor of a State must necessarily exercise more political power than the citizen who merely casts his vote. Each exercises a share of political power, but if the right were inherent each would be entitled to share it equally. That is the law of nature. That is the law which the God of nature has imposed upon us.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose at this time to go at any length into this subject of female suffrage. I have no time to draw fancy pictures about the beauty of home and about "woman's sphere" and "man's sphere." Suffice it to say that I believe God has made the two sexes each the complement of the other, and that each in acting as the complement of the other performs the highest duties which God intended it should perform.

But I have this to say further, in a political point of view, upon this question: In the convention which framed the Constitution which gave to Congress the power to admit new States they did not define what States were. It is not necessary to go to the authority of a dictionary or to a publicist to ascertain what a State is. States were in political existence before that Constitution was framed, and the framers of the Constitution understood what States were.

Now, what were those States which they must have had in mind? They were bodies of people united together politically under a form of government which was free, where the rulers were held responsible to the ruled through the exercise of the suffrage of adult males. That was the universal law of the country, and that was what the framers of the Constitution understood by States. And when the Constitution provided for the admission of new States into the Union it provided for the admission of those States under the same form as the States which already existed.

The new States which Congress was to have the power to admit were to be States as Connecticut was, the same as Massachusetts was, the same as Pennsylvania was, the same as Virginia was, the same as South Carolina was. That was the character and kind of State which was contemplated by the framers of the Constitution in that clause which provided that Congress might admit new States, which should become part and parcel and members of the Federal Union of which the old thirteen States was composed. They never contemplated for a moment the idea of a State in which women would share equally in political power with men. Suppose Wyoming had come here to-day with a constitution excluding men from the right of holding office, from the right of voting, confining the right of suffrage and the privilege of holding office to women entirely, would you say a State organized in that way was such a State as was contemplated by the Constitution?

Again, suppose—for it is possible and it would not be violative of the letter of the Constitution, though it would be of its spirit—suppose Wyoming had adopted a constitution providing that the right of suffrage should be vested in all persons from the age of twelve years up to forty-five, would you say that a State with such a constitution was such a State as Washington, and Jefferson, and Madison, and John Adams, and Alexander Hamilton had contemplated? No, Mr. Speaker, such a thing never was intended.

It is a very easy matter to say you will confer female suffrage in the selection of boards of school trustees or in the administration of public charities; but to say that women shall elect members of Congress and United States Senators, may be elected as Representatives in Congress or as United States Senators—that they shall join in shaping the national legislation which is to affect the rights and interests of the whole people throughout our vast domain—I say that a constitution and such a form of government was never contemplated. I recognize the right of each State to the fullest extent to prescribe the qualifications for the exercise of the right of suffrage, subject only to the changes in the recent amendments to the Constitution; but while I recognize this right I claim still that in the exercise of a sound discretion I have a right to vote against the admission of any new State which prescribes qualifications of suffrage which I believe to be injurious to the best interest of the country. I believe suffrage to be a great political right, not to be conferred indiscriminately on all alike, without regard to sex, age, or condition. Upon its proper exercise depends, in my judgment, the preservation of free constitutional government. It is an organism which lies at its very base.

Upon this point I would like to read a few words from Mr. Calhoun's essay on government, a work worthy of the study of every student of politics and which will be more and more esteemed in the future than it has been in the past:

Now government, then, must be constructed, in order to counteract, through its organism, this tendency on the part of those who make and execute the laws to oppress those subject to their operation, is the next question which claims attention.

There is but one way in which this can possibly be done; and that is, by such an organism as will furnish the ruled with the means of resisting successfully this tendency on the part of the rulers to oppression and abuse. Power can only be resisted by power, and tendency by tendency. Those who exercise power and those subject to its exercise—the rulers and the ruled—stand in antagonistic relations to each other.

The same constitution of our nature which leads rulers to oppress the ruled—regardless of the object for which government is ordained—will, with equal strength, lead the ruled to resist when possessed of the means of making peaceable and effective resistance. Such an organism, then, as will furnish the means by which resistance may be systematically and peaceably made on the part of the ruled to oppression and abuse of power on the part of the rulers, is the first and indispensable step towards forming a constitutional government. And as this can only be effected by or through the right of suffrage (the right on the part of the ruled to choose their rulers at proper intervals and to hold them thereby responsible for their conduct)—the responsibility of the rulers to the ruled through the right of suffrage is the indispensable and primary principle in the foundation of a constitutional government.

That is what the right of suffrage meant. It was an organism lying at the basis of constitutional government; and it was not intended for females and children, but men.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARNES. No, sir; I can not.

Mr. HILL. Just a short question.

Mr. BARNES. Well, sir, if I may be allowed the time I will do so.

Mr. HILL. Thus far you have not discussed this question upon principle—

Mr. BARNES. No, sir; and I have not time to do it. Please take your seat, sir. If I had unlimited time to argue this question I might go into an abstract discussion with the gentleman about the right of home, of solitude, of exile, and a thousand other things [laughter], but, sir, I am arguing this question on high political principles. I say that the right of suffrage is an organism, the means by which the State has provided for lodging a certain share of political power in the hands of electors.

When we come to exercise political power we enact it in the form of law. Law is worthless without the exercise of force to carry it into effect; it is only by the aid of that portion of the community intrusted with suffrage that the force of law can be accomplished and carried into practical execution. It is on the force which resides alone in the male sex that the State must rely for the execution of law, whether she executes it through her officers, her posse comitatus, or her armies or fleets, and it is to that sex, representing that force, which should be committed the political power for enacting opinion into law.

Whatever may be the views of gentlemen on the abstract question in regard to the right of women to vote, I think I have demonstrated at least that it was never contemplated by the fathers of the Republic; it was never part and parcel of the principles ingrained in the American constitutions from New Hampshire to Georgia when the thirteen States entered the Union. And when the convention which formed the Constitution of the United States gave to Congress power to admit new States into the Union they meant to admit such States as were then formed, as were then in existence, of which they had practical knowledge and practical experience.

I could argue this question at much greater length; but the hands of the clock warn me that my time has nearly expired. Suffice it to say now that there were three propositions with which I set out. First, that there have been gross irregularities in the formation of this constitution sent here by Wyoming; that the convention which framed the Constitution was held without authority of law; that the election for delegates to that convention was in fact void; that there was no mode of punishment prescribed, and none could possibly have been prescribed, for fraudulent voting at that election; that there is no evidence that the people themselves gave this constitution their approval. Next, I have held that the population proper to entitle a Territory to admission as a State is here wanting—wanting according to all precedents, according to all forms, according to all our history in reference to the admission of States. Thirdly, I have held that this question of female suffrage, which is introduced as a most extraordinary feature in this constitution, has never been fairly submitted to a vote of the people of that Territory, and we have no knowledge whether they favor it or not. I repeat that this is a new feature in American constitutions, is contrary to the experience and history of the country, not conformable to the constitutions of the different States, and in my judgment it is fraught with great danger to the free institutions under which we live, and to the harmony, welfare, and good order of society. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STRUBLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire at this time to ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen may extend their remarks on this subject in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that members may extend their remarks on this subject in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CAREY obtained the floor and said: I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. VANDEVER.)

Mr. VANDEVER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNES] made a reference in the course of his speech to the act for the admission of California as a State. He remarked that that act was a compromise measure; and so it was. But what was the nature of the compromise? California came to the Congress of the United States with a constitution framed without the preliminary of an enabling act by Congress. In that constitution was incorporated a clause from the ordinance of 1787, providing that slavery and involuntary servitude, except as a penalty for crime, should be forever prohibited within that State.

Almost without exception, every Democratic member of the two branches of Congress rose in hostility to the incorporation of that provision into the constitution of California. They forced a compromise. What was it? What were the so-called compromise measures of 1850 that the friends of California were compelled to consent to to procure the admission of the State into the Union?

In the first place they were compelled to consent to the passage of an odious fugitive-slave law. In the second place, that in the passage of the Territorial laws for New Mexico and Utah we should forego the insertion of an anti-slavery clause similar to that contained in the ordinance of 1787. There was no possibility at that time of obtaining the admission of California into the Union except by agreeing to those terms dictated by the Democratic members of both Houses of Congress; and we had also to consent to payment of a bonus of $10,000,000 from the public Treasury to the State of Texas.

There was no Republican party in existence at that time, but the foundation of the Republican party was laid upon this issue. It dug the grave of the Democratic party and led to the election of Abraham Lincoln in 1860. [Applause.] It led to the total extinction of slavery in this country by the war of the rebellion. [Renewed applause.]

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNES] refers to it as the compromise measure of 1850. They held to that compromise principle until 1854, when the question came up in regard to the formation of a State government in Kansas.

The Democratic party forced the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act through Congress in 1854 as their pet measure in the hope and with the purpose of organizing one or both of these Territories into slave States. They claimed that the so-called compromise legislation of 1850, by which California gained admission to the Union as a free State, was inconsistent with the anti-slavery provisions of the ordinance of 1787 and with a similar provision in the Missouri compromise act of 1820; in other words, it was claimed by the Democratic party in 1854 that they had consented to the admission of California with her free State constitution upon condition that the policy of excluding slavery from Territories as inaugurated by the ordinance of 1787 should be abandoned by Congress in its future action. This is the kind of compromise the gentleman from Georgia refers to, approvingly, in his objections to the suffrage features of the Wyoming constitution.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNES] says that he has respect for precedents of the past. He has called up memories connected with the compromise measures of 1850 which secured the admission of California as a State. She did not come into the Union with the consent of the Democratic party. The friends of California had to pay for her admission by a reluctant consent to the passage of the fugitive-slave law. The friends of suffrage and freedom were compelled at that time at the dictation of the Democratic party to consent to this compromise. [Applause.]

Mr. CAREY. Mr. Speaker, since my first entrance into the Hall of the House of Representatives as a Delegate of the people of Wyoming Territory it has been my first thought to do that which seemed best to be done to promote the measures which to them were of the greatest concern. During the five sessions of Congress that I have had the privileges of this floor, whether here or performing the duties incumbent upon me elsewhere in this Capital, I have not for a moment forgotten that I am not a Representative of a State, and that I am here not because my people had any constitutional right to send me, and that whatever of privileges are accorded me are derived solely through the sufferance of the legislative branch of the Government.

The treatment received at your hands has been most cordial. If my rights had been measured by your high standard of welcome I should have been more than convinced ere now that the privileges of a Delegate were in all respects equal to those of a Representative of a State. For the reason that I have been a Delegate only, I have occupied the time of the House always with reluctance. If to-day I should be more generous in the use of your time than has been my custom my excuse shall be that the question under consideration is of importance beyond measure to my people. If your decision should be favorable it will mean to them those rights of citizenship not heretofore enjoyed. It will give them all the political rights of American freemen. It will elevate them from the condition of a province to the enjoyment of the privileges of the grandest of all political divisions, those afforded by an American State. You will therefore to-day pardon my boldness. Who would not be courageous under the same circumstances? Two thousand miles away I can see the outlines of a new star that is about to take its place in the constellation of States. You will forgive my enthusiasm, for I behold in your countenance, which is but the index of the soul, a warm welcome to the new State. I know that you, the Representatives of the greatest people that live, are ready to extend the hand of fellowship and admit a young, a proud, and noble people, the offspring of your own homes, with their new Commonwealth, into the very heart of the Union of States.

In 1850, in the House of Representatives, Mr. Winthrop, of Massachusetts said:

I see in the Territorial possessions of this Union the seats of new States, the cradles of new Commonwealths, the nurseries, it may be, of new Republics, an empire. I see in them the future abodes of our brethren, our children, and our children's children, for a thousand generations.

Seventeen States had then been admitted into the original Union. Since the utterance of the prophecy twelve great States have been admitted, eleven of which were organized from the then territory of the United States and are inhabited by millions of progressive and patriotic people. To-day five more Territories have the requisite number of people and the necessary wealth to be admitted as States and to enter upon careers of growth and prosperity not excelled by any of the States heretofore admitted into the Union.

The Territory of Wyoming, except a small area on the western part of its southern boundary, obtained under the treaty of peace with Mexico in 1848, was included in the Louisiana purchase.

Though the Territory, with the exception named, had belonged to France and was then ceded to Spain, and by Spain back to France, and had, from the organization of Missouri in 1812, in part been included within the boundaries of several organized Territories, it was virtually without government until the organization of the Territory of Wyoming in May, 1869, under the provisions of the act of Congress of July 25, 1868, entitled "An act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Wyoming."

Note the word "temporary." The act could have been as properly entitled "An act to govern the child Wyoming until she is of age to enter the sisterhood of States." Not unlike many Territories that have preceded her; not unlike many of her sisters who have not yet formed a Union, she has been required to serve a full term of pupillage. Before Wyoming, under the provisions of this bill, can consummate her union she will have turned the twenty-first milestone in her history.

THE ORDINANCE OF 1787.

In the twelfth year of the Independence of the United States, and whilst the Constitutional Convention was in session in Philadelphia, and nearly two years before the Constitution of the United States went into full operation, "The ordinance for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio River" was ordained by the Confederate Congress.

Few laws have been enacted that have exerted a greater influence for the happiness of mankind, for its disenfranchisement, for the cause of republican government. Under the provisions of this ordinance Territories have been organized and great States builded. Read by the light of a subsequent century, it must be pronounced second to none of those remarkable instruments produced during the infant days of the Republic. To go back to the time of its enactment and look over the important events that followed it, it must be admitted that the lawgivers who made it were gifted with a power most extraordinary to look into the future and open the way for great States whose foundations should be freedom, equality before the law, freedom of conscience, education of the masses, and an indestructible union of States.

All Territorial governments since created and organized have been founded on this historic document. Every new State admitted has been upon the plan proposed by its wise provisions. Its sentiment and its most important principles were incorporated in the Constitution itself. It has afforded the framework for the bills of right and State constitution that have since been adopted. It guarantied to the people of the Northwestern Territory those principles of government which have ever been dear to the American people.

It provided that the people at the earliest possible moment should be permitted, through their representatives, to frame their own laws. To the people were insured the benefits of the writs of habeas corpus and the trial by jury.

It declared all persons shall be bailable, unless for capital offenses, when the proof shall be evident or the presumption great. It forbade unusual punishments.

It provided that no man should be deprived of his liberty or property but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land, and should the public exigencies make it necessary for the common preservation to take any person's property or to demand his particular services full compensation should be made for the same.

It provided that no law should be made to affect private contracts or engagements made in good faith. It declared that religion, morality, and knowledge—being necessary for good government and the happiness of mankind—schools and the means of education should be forever encouraged.

It is not necessary to ask the question why was this government instituted. The reason of the ordinance is best answered by its own provisions:

And for extending the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty which form the basis whereon these republics, their laws, and constitution are erected. To fix and establish those principles as the basis of all laws, constitutions, and governments which forever hereafter shall be formed in the said Territory. To provide also for the establishment of State and permanent governments therein, and for their admission to a share in the Federal councils on an equal footing with the original States at as early periods as may be consistent with the general interests.

The purpose, then, of the ordinance was to prepare the people to become States. Article V defines when the people of any one of the States formed may be admitted into the Confederacy:

And whenever any of the said States shall have 60,000 free inhabitants therein, such State shall be admitted, by its delegates, into the Congress of the United States on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever; and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government: Provided, The constitution and government so formed shall be republican and in conformity to the principles contained in these articles, and, so far as it can be consistent with the general interest of the Confederacy such admission shall be allowed at an earlier period and when there may be a less number of free inhabitants in the State than 60,000.

I particularly desire to call your attention to the part of the proviso where it says "And so far as it can be consistent with the general interest of the Confederacy such admission shall be allowed at an earlier period, and when there may be a less number of free inhabitants in the State than 60,000."

The States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin were formed out of the Northwest Territory, and each in turn was admitted into the Union. With the exception of Wisconsin, it is not probable that any one of the States named had a population of 60,000 free inhabitants at the date of admission. It was estimated that Ohio had 45,000 of population, Illinois 35,000, Indiana 63,000, and Michigan 65,000. It may be safely asserted, however, that it was found consistent with the interests of the older States to admit four out of five States created in the Northwest Territory with a less number than 60,000 free inhabitants.

This ordinance, either by direct act, by implication, or by inheritance, if it may be permitted to use the word, was from time to time extended to every Territory since organized. The Louisiana purchase of 1803 was the following year divided into two great Territories, the northern portion being known as the Territory of Louisiana. The ordinance of 1787 was made applicable by act of Congress to that great Territory. Subsequently the Territory of Missouri was organized. This Territory included nearly all the area now constituting the Territory of Wyoming. The rights of this ordinance were retained for Missouri.

Time will not permit me to follow all the changes that occurred in the creation of Territories and States from the organization of the Territory of Missouri, which the maps show extended from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean, to the date of the organization of Wyoming. The changes have been many. It is sufficient for my present purpose to state that all of the Territory except a small strip on the western southern border purchased from the Republic of Mexico was included in the Territory of Missouri, all except a strip on the western border has since formed a part of the Territory of Nebraska, while at a subsequent period the major portion of Wyoming became a part of the Territory of Dakota.

It was shown in the discussion that took place over the admission of the Dakotas that by implication the people of Dakota were entitled to the rights, privileges, and immunities that were granted to the inhabitants of the Northwestern Territory. It is safe to say that the people of Wyoming through the Territories from which their Territory was organized are now entitled to admission under the provisions of the ordinance of 1787.

Perhaps no questions have been more thoroughly discussed than those that affect the acquisition of new territory, the organization of temporary government therein, and the admission of new States. These great discussions have been participated in by the ablest men of the Republic.

I believe an investigation of the whole subject will convince any impartial mind that this Government has acquired new territory for but one purpose, to admit the people thereof at the earliest possible moment as a State or States; that all the legislation of Congress in the establishment of temporary governments and the admission of new States, while often tardy in the exercise of its power, has been to afford to the people of a new country at the earliest possible moment "all the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizens of the United States," which can only be secured under the provisions of the constitution of a State admitted "on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever."

Though the right to acquire territory is not expressly given by the Constitution, it is no longer denied that the United States as a nation possesses this power. The practice of nearly a century establishes the further fact that until the people of such territory are prepared to be incorporated into the Union Congress may establish temporary governments over such acquired territory. The highest court of the land has also decided that territory can be acquired, but not to be held permanently in a provincial condition. The Supreme Court in 19 Howard, 448, said:

There is certainly no power given by the Constitution to the Federal Government to establish and maintain colonies bordering on the United States, or at a distance, to be ruled and governed at its own pleasure, nor to enlarge its territorial limits in any way except by the admission of new States. That power is plainly given, and if a new State is admitted it needs no further legislation by Congress, because the Constitution itself defines the relative rights and powers and duties of the State, and the citizens of the State, and the Federal Government. But no power is given to acquire a territory to be acquired and held permanently in that character.

We do not mean, however, to question the power of Congress in this respect. The power to expand the United States by the admission of new States is plainly given; and in the construction of this power by all the departments of the Government it has been held to authorize the acquisition of territory, not fit for admission at the time, but to be admitted as soon as its population and situation entitle it to admission. It is acquired to become a State, and not to be held as a colony and governed by Congress with absolute authority; and as the propriety of admitting a new State is committed to the sound discretion of Congress, the power to acquire territory for that purpose, to be held by the United States until it is in a suitable condition to become a State upon an equal footing with the other States, must rest upon the same discretion.

The Constitution framed in 1787 had been in actual operation for a period of fourteen years when, under Mr. Jefferson's administration, the Louisiana purchase was effected. This great territory was acquired for one purpose only, to be admitted as States into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. The parties to the treaty were then, as they are now, the two greatest living republics. The third article of this treaty says:

The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States.

The States of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Iowa, a part of Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, and North and South Dakota, the Indian Territory, and all but a small portion of Wyoming have been carved from the country obtained by the cession. In this treaty, though the same language is not used, the same guaranty is made to the inhabitants in the territory acquired as was given to the people of the Northwestern Territory. The same privileges and rights, namely, to become States of the Republic, have been guaranteed by solemn treaties to the people of each and every Territory acquired.

Note the language of article 6 of the treaty with Spain by which we acquired the Floridas:

The inhabitants of the territories which His Catholic Majesty cedes the United States by this treaty shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States as soon as may be consistent with the principles of the Federal Constitution and admitted to the enjoyment of all privileges, rights, and immunities of the citizens of the United States.

The United States next acquired the territory of the Lone Star Republic. In this case it was found consistent with the principles of the Federal Constitution to admit Texas immediately as a State and her people to the enjoyment of all the privileges, rights, and immunities of citizens of the United States.

But let us proceed further.

By the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo of 1848 we acquired a very large territory from the Republic of Mexico. The ninth article of this treaty provides that—

Mexicans who in the territories aforesaid shall not preserve the character of citizens of the Mexican Republic * * * shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States and be admitted at the proper time (to be judged by the Congress of the United States) to the enjoyment of all the rights of the citizens of the United States according to the principles of the Constitution.—United States Statutes at Large, volume 9.

Before this treaty was ratified the words "to be judged by the Congress of the United States" were inserted by the Senate. The Mexican Government then refused to ratify lest the words inserted might preclude the people of the ceded territory of the rights of American citizens.

To a communication received from the Mexican Government, Mr. Buchanan, then Secretary of State, replied as follows, which secured the ratification of the treaty by the Mexican Government:

Congress, under all the circumstances and under the treaties, are the sole judges of this proper time, because they, and they only, under the Federal Constitution, have power to admit new States into the Union. That they will always exercise this power as soon as the condition of the inhabitants of any acquired territory may render it proper, can not be doubted. By this means the Federal Treasury can alone be relieved from the expense of supporting Territorial governments. Besides, Congress will never turn a deaf ear to a people anxious to enjoy the privilege of self-government. Their desire to become one of the States of this Union will be granted the moment it can be done with safety.

It will be seen that Mr. Buchanan's interpretation of the treaty leaves the principle under discussion in exactly the same condition as the treaties with other powers antecedent to it.

We think, therefore, it is plain that the people of Wyoming may rightfully now ask to be measured by the provisions of the ordinance of 1787, as well as by the articles of the treaties under which their Territory and the jurisdiction over the same were acquired for incorporation into the Union.

No question arising under the Constitution of the United States has created wider discussion in both branches of Congress than the section which provides that "Congress may admit new States into the Union." The more deeply we investigate the principles which have governed Congress acting under this provision of the Constitution the more firmly are we convinced that no inflexible rule, no plan, no mode has ever been prescribed, much less followed, for the admission of new States. In all ways have people come and asked to be taken into the Union. In some instances compliance with the request has for the time being been delayed, but the past proves that no people properly equipped and presenting themselves in the right spirit will ever appeal in vain for admission as a State.

The question when or how new States should be admitted was discussed very fully in the convention which formed the Constitution. The acquiring of the territory out of which so many States have been carved does not appear to have been contemplated; yet there was even then a fear expressed at the power that might be wielded by the new States of the West. Some of the members of that great and illustrious body, though noted for their broad and liberal views, contended that restrictions and limitations should be placed upon the powers of Congress to extend the number of new States, and that if new States were admitted they should not be admitted on an equal footing with the original States.

Fortunately, such men as Mr. Madison took the ground that no such restrictions should be imposed, he insisting that the Western States neither would nor ought to submit to a union which degraded them from an equal rank with the other States. The provision incorporated in the Constitution has proven to be a wise and a far-reaching one. It has depth; it has breadth; it has length. The Constitution provides:

New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

Under this provision of the Constitution there are but two restrictions on the discretion of Congress in the exercise of its power in the admission of new States:

First, no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of another State "without the consent of the Legislature of the State concerned as well as of the Congress;" and, second, "Nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress."

State pride, similarity of interest, the same history, the worshiping of the same heroes, form an all-powerful protection to a State. For these reasons no State willingly surrenders its territory or a part of its people. Congress has only been called upon once in seventy years to consent to the creation of a State within the jurisdiction of another State. This exception would not have taken place in a time of peace. It was one of the results of the civil war.

Territory has been acquired by purchase and by discovery. The United States have erected in some instances Territorial governments; in other cases the acquired territory has been admitted directly as a State. The discretion vested in Congress has been wisely exercised. In what other line of legislation have so few mistakes been made? But little in this direction would Congress recall were it in its power to do so. As the people in a given area have presented themselves, their case has been considered and generally the decision has been in the affirmative. Each has adopted its own plan and the questions affecting the admission of the new State have been discussed with reference to that particular case.

Since the Constitution requires that the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government Congress has always required the community that asks to be intrusted with the powers of a State, before admission to present itself with a constitution republican in form. This, with a people confident of their strength, with a territory of adequate area sufficiently developed to indicate resources to make an important State, affirmatively shown, has been the only test required. The policy pursued has resulted in increasing the number of the thirteen original States, whose people by their courage and love of self-government and whose patriotic and unselfish statesmen made the confederacy possible, to the forty-two States now composing the Republic.

We now come to the other questions involved: "Is the applicant prepared to be a State? Are the boundaries defined and is the Territory of suitable area? Do the number of inhabitants, the conduct of the people during the probationary period of twenty-one years, the accumulated wealth, the developed and undeveloped resources, justify Congress in the exercise of its discretion in an affirmative manner in admitting Wyoming now as a State?" If so, the only remaining question will be, Do the people present themselves with a constitution republican in form? I believe, following all the precedents of the past, every unbiased mind will, after an examination of these questions, answer each and every proposition contained therein in the affirmative.

Fortunately for Wyoming, and unlike in this respect several of the Territories that have preceded her, there are no questions of boundaries or divisions to be determined antecedent to admission.

The boundaries defined for the temporary government in 1868 have remained unchanged. They have been surveyed and marked. None of the people within these boundaries ask for a division and attachment to an adjoining State or Territory, nor do any wish to encroach upon a neighbor to the extent of one foot of territory.

The country you gave them as a Territory they now desire as a State. From the beginning they have labored to this end. The law made them one people. In their association in overcoming the same obstacles, enduring the same hardships, and managing the same affairs they have become the same people in sentiment and feeling, and are bound together more strongly than any law could ever make them.

Wyoming and Colorado are the only political divisions of the United States that are inclosed by four straight lines. The boundaries form a rectangle approaching a square, and scarcely could a State containing an area of nearly 100 square miles be made more compact. The State of Wyoming will be the eighth in point of size; more than one-third as large as Texas, two-thirds as large as California or Montana, approximating in area Colorado, nearly as large as New York and Pennsylvania combined, more than twelve times as large as New Jersey, twenty times as large as Connecticut, and nearly eighty times as large as Rhode Island.

These comparisons do not show that the State of Wyoming will be too large; nor can it be claimed that Wyoming will be too small to make a great State.

It is doubtful whether any State has been admitted unless the question of population has been raised. From the admission of Kentucky in 1792 to the present time, it has been urged by those opposed to new States that the applicant was not entitled to admission because of the insufficiency of population. As a fact, however, whether a new State should be taken into the Union has been determined by other questions. The number of the population has had but little effect in the matter. Before the civil war the real question was that of the extension or restriction of slavery, which resolved itself into a question of political or party expediency. An examination of this question becomes most interesting.

Three States (Illinois, Arkansas, and Florida) were admitted, each with less than 33,000 free inhabitants, while the people of Dakota were deprived of the blessings of State government until the population of their Territory had reached quite a half a million of people.

If we omit Maine and West Virginia, which had shared the governments of mother States, and the States admitted under the omnibus bill of 1890, which States should have been recognized from five to ten years before they were, of the twenty-three remaining legislative States only five can it be claimed (Texas, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, and Colorado) had at the respective dates of admission as much as 100,000 inhabitants. Of the remaining seventeen, only five as much as 75,000 people, while the remaining thirteen States had from 33,000 to 70,000 population. The average population of the twenty-three States will scarcely exceed 70,000 inhabitants.

The following ten great States had an average of about 60,000 population at date of admission, the population being determined in each instance by estimates of the people themselves or by an imperfect census.

The growth of the population of Wyoming has been steady. There have been no booms or immigration societies to create an ephemeral growth or bring together a heterogeneous mass of people. Consequently there has been no retrogression in population since the Territory was organized. By the time the State government is fully in operation, under the provisions of this bill, I have no doubt that the population will approximate that required for a member of Congress under the present ratio of apportionment. There is nothing in a Territory to call out a full vote. There is but little party feeling, and every election may be said to occur in an off year.

The settlements are widely separated. The distances are great. The polling-places are far removed from each other. In Wyoming the population is scattered over a territory of nearly 100,000 square miles, an area nearly equal to that of the States of Illinois, Indiana, and Connecticut combined. The increase of the vote each two years since the Territory was organized can leave but little doubt that if the same percentage of the total vote should go to the polls at the next election as were gotten out at the Delegate election in 1888, when the vote was 18,210, there will be polled about 23,000 votes. With State government the vote will be several thousand larger.

To secure as full a vote as can be obtained in a well settled country is an impossibility. A governor who was much opposed to State government estimated the population of the Territory in 1887 at 85,000. The vote in 1888 showed an increase of 23 per cent. in two years. A larger increase will be shown this year. Very few States have been admitted with a larger population than Wyoming now has.

The following table of figures, compiled from official sources, of the votes cast at Presidential elections in the States named best illustrate my statement:

was that a very large portion of the voters were aliens. Yet the whole vote at the first State election, when the governor, judiciary, and other State officers and Legislature to choose United States Senators were selected, was only 14,232; Oregon, under the same circumstances, cast 10,121 votes.

In the great debate arising over the admission of Kansas it was not claimed that over 13,289 votes had ever been cast, and this State, at the second Congressional election after admission, showed a vote of 15,272. Colorado, at the election next preceding admission, cast 17,100 votes. The State increased this vote nearly 50 per cent. at the first State election.

The case of Nebraska, though one of the young States, is perhaps the most marked. In the discussion that took place at the time of its admission it was disclosed that at the election immediately preceding that which had given a doubtful majority for the constitution of scarcely 100, and which had resulted in the election of State officers, a member of Congress, and the selection of two United States Senators, the total vote cast was 9,120. Nebraska, at the first Congressional election thereafter, cast 14,170 votes, a gain of more than 50 per cent.

I will not continue these comparisons, but let each draw his own conclusions. If California, Nebraska, and Kansas with the votes cast had 100,000 people at the dates of their admission, is it not safe to conclude that the vote that Wyoming will cast at her first State election will more than justify Congress in admitting her as a State?

Mr. Speaker, no particular number of inhabitants is prescribed by the Constitution, nor have the precedents fixed any number necessary for a State. The Constitution says the Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, and that each State shall have at least one Representative. Any law which might be enacted would not necessarily govern or control Congress in the exercise of its discretion. Each case as a people presents itself must be left to the wisdom of the legislative department of the Government.

Congress has passed no general law on the subject and never will. The policy of the Government has been to admit the new States as soon as the people of such States had confidence in themselves to maintain a State government. Representation under our system of government has always been unequal, and it could not be otherwise. The want of equality is usually most felt in the Western growing States. To make the matter clear I will repeat what I said on the subject before the Committee on Territories:

As I have said on another occasion, equal representation as a theory is good enough; in practice it is an impossibility. There are Congressional districts represented in the House by one member that under the present basis of apportionment are entitled to three and perhaps four Representatives. Men are sent to Congress to represent ideas and questions of public policy. The influence of a State in the national legislature depends not so much upon the number of its delegation as upon the character, integrity, and ability of its Representatives. As a rule the new States are the ones that do not have their full representation. Whatever deficiency there may be in population at the date of admission of a State is more than compensated for before the second decade in the State's history has passed.

The admission of Kansas, Nebraska, and Colorado, each in turn, was opposed for the want of sufficient population to entitle them to a Representative. Note the fact that a Congressional district of Nebraska bordering on the eastern boundary of Wyoming, represented by a worthy member of this committee (Mr. Downey), cast in 1888 nearly 78,000 votes, more votes than Nebraska had population at the date of her admission. Judge PETERS, of Kansas, represents probably as many voters as Kansas had population when admitted. But the most marked case is Wyoming's neighbor on the south, Colorado. Loud protests were made against her admission for the want of sufficient population, yet there were 92,000 votes cast for her one Representative at the last election. Unless an apportionment is made before the next Congressional election, I have no doubt the smallest of these three districts will cast at least 100,000 votes.

I might continue to fortify the case of Wyoming by calling attention to the vote in many of the States subsequent to their admission into the Union, but I shall only instance four or five other cases, which I believe will be sufficient to convince the most skeptical. Wisconsin at the election next preceding her admission as a State cast 20,318 votes. This State was admitted and accorded three members of Congress. At the first Congressional election in the State there were 24,600 voters. Louisiana, admitted in 1812, at an election for governor in 1822, with four candidates, polled 4,748 votes. Illinois was admitted in 1818. At an election held in 1822 for the election of a governor and a Representative in Congress 8,075 votes were cast. Arkansas and Michigan were admitted in 1836. The former cast at the Presidential election that year 3,638 and the latter 11,360 votes.

Florida, admitted in 1845, cast at one of her first Congressional elections 5,301; Iowa, admitted in 1846, cast at her first election 13,271 and was given two members of Congress. At the time of the admission of California as a State the population consisted almost exclusively of men, and one of the chief objections to California becoming a State

Again, quoting Mr. Winthrop's California speech:

It is said she has not population enough. The best accounts that we can obtain estimate her population at more than 100,000 souls. * * * And what, after all, are any estimates of population worth in such a case? The British orator, Burke, said of the American colonies in 1775, "Such is the strength with which population shoots in that part of the world, that, state the numbers as high as we will, whilst the dispute continues the exaggeration ends."

While we are discussing any given magnitude they are grown to it.

RESOURCES OF WYOMING.

The resources of Wyoming are varied and of that character that are in constant demand to supply the wants of the civilized world. These resources developed are sure to make Wyoming a wealthy and prosperous State.

General Powell, the Chief of the United States Geological Survey, and Mr. Elwood Mead, the hydraulic engineer of Wyoming, estimate that there are from ten to twelve millions of acres of lands in the Territory so situated with reference to the water supply that they may be successfully cultivated by irrigation. The moisture precipitated on the mountains and plains gathered in the great water arteries is sufficient to permanently reclaim such an acreage as will make Wyoming an important agricultural State.

To the ten to twelve million acres that may be irrigated, there should be added from four to five millions of acres that will ultimately be brought into bearing without the aid of irrigation. But no agriculturist who has tried both systems will ever abandon the former, where water is accessible, to conduct what is known on the plains as dry farming. Farming with the aid of artificial irrigation while the oldest is also the best.

It is the only system under which the crops may be improved by a drought. Where it is necessarily resorted to, the rains do not come in any season in such quantities as to discourage the farmer or to destroy the husbandman's well deserved harvest.

Wyoming is rich in agricultural possibilities. In the valleys and on the benches and plateaus the soil is very productive. Before it is touched by the hand of man it is in appearance barren and unsightly. With water and the skill of the farmer it becomes, in many cases, of twice the productive capacity of lands in the most favored of the agricultural States. Irrigation does not impoverish, but the distribution of the mountain sediment becomes a perennial fertilizer to the soil.

The tame grasses, timothy, alfalfa, and clover, and wheat, oats, barley, rye, potatoes, melons, garden vegetables, berries, and other small fruits and hardy varieties of apples are being successfully and generally grown. For the want of transportation facilities there is a large surplus of agricultural products in the farming districts; especially is this the case in the northern part of the Territory. In the districts devoted exclusively to the mining and grazing industries, with the necessary transportation this surplus would find a good and ready market. One of the most profitable of the agricultural crops is that of the cultivated grasses. This is fed to live stock, and the cattle and sheep are driven to the railroads for transportation. The large herds furnish a certain demand for the entire product.

East of the Big Horn Mountains, north of the center of the Territory, extending over an area of 5,000 square miles, are sufficient lands of rich soil with an abundance of available water to supply agricultural products for a large population.

I can not better show the present condition of the agricultural interests of Wyoming, and what may be expected of this great Territory in this direction, than by calling attention to the following facts, gleaned from the official reports of Elwood Mead, the hydraulic engineer of Wyoming:

First. In the volume and distribution of her water supply Wyoming takes first place among the States and the Territories of the arid belt.

Second. Within her boundaries and in a circle of which the radius is less than 10 miles are the sources of three of the great rivers of North America, the Missouri, Colorado, and Columbia, crossing the continent in three directions, and emptying respectively into the Gulf of Mexico, the Gulf of California, and the Pacific Ocean.

Third. Four great rivers cross the border of Wyoming: the Big Horn on the north, the Platte in the east, the Green on the south, and the Snake on the west. The tributaries of these streams penetrate all parts of her vast extent, and are fed by the rains and melting snows of a mountain area of Wyoming and Colorado of over 20,000,000 of acres.

Fourth. Wyoming's situation is such that before these waters are diverted elsewhere her farmers will always have the first opportunity to be supplied.

Fifth. Six hundred natural water ways have their waters diverted wholly or in part by irrigation in Wyoming.

Sixth. Wyoming stands third in extent of irrigated lands, which amounts to an area of nearly 2,500,000 acres, equal to two-thirds of the irrigated district of Italy, and equal to the irrigated districts of France and Spain combined. This great irrigation area can be more than doubled without the aid of storage basins.

Seventh. Wyoming has 3,000 irrigation ditches and canals, with a total length of nearly 5,000 miles, exclusive of the laterals.

Eighth. That more than $10,000,000 are invested in irrigation canals and works, and over $15,000,000 have been expended in the reclamation of desert lands.

Ninth. That the lands now reclaimed, if divided into small farms, with the means of transportation which would furnish markets, would employ and support more than a quarter of a million of people.

Tenth. That the great area of irrigable lands in Wyoming, which become enormously productive, is equal in extent to the combined irrigated area of Egypt and Italy, which support 10,000,000 of people.

Before leaving this branch of my remarks I wish to call the attention of the committee to the amount of improved lands in several of the States. The census of 1880 shows the area of improved farms in the following States to be:

	Acres.
Colorado.....	616,169
Connecticut.....	1,642,000
Delaware.....	746,000
Florida.....	947,640
Louisiana.....	2,739,000
Massachusetts.....	2,128,000
New Hampshire.....	2,308,000
New Jersey.....	2,996,000
Rhode Island.....	298,485
Vermont.....	3,265,000
West Virginia.....	3,792,327

Closely allied to the farming industry are the grazing or pastoral interests. Contiguous to the valleys and plateaus susceptible of irrigation are lands aggregating 30,000,000 acres well adapted for grazing purposes. Indeed, there are no finer grazing fields in the world than are found in this Territory. The soil each year returns its crop of grass upon which all kinds of domestic farm animals may be kept each month in the year. Such is the quality of the grass that if these ranges are not overstocked the percentage of loss is not greater than on a well conducted farm.

In the last five years the manner of conducting this business has been greatly changed. The herds have been improved; great crops of cultivated grasses are harvested. In this wise the capacity of a given section to carry stock is increased and the liability of the business to losses during the winter months greatly lessened. In Wyoming there are at least 3,000 Angora goats (a new business), 175,000 horses, 1,250,000 sheep, and 1,500,000 neat cattle. These great herds of domestic animals of civilized man have entirely supplanted the buffalo, which furnished to the Indian his choicest meat, a roof for his wigwam, and coverlet and mattress for his bed.

There are from eight to ten million of acres of forests in Wyoming. Probably two-thirds of this area is covered with a good quality of pine and spruce. These lands, with the exception of small areas included in the grant to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, are still owned by the General Government. With the proper protection these forests will build up an important commerce and always afford to the inhabitants of Wyoming an abundant supply of lumber to meet the demands of the city and the agricultural and mining interests, besides being the means of regulating and holding up the annual water supply derived from the melting snows of the mountains until required by the farmer in the irrigation of his crops.

These forests have scarcely been disturbed. Indeed those acquainted with the forest area say that the value of these forests has greatly increased since the organization of the Territory, through the protection given by the laws, not of the United States, but of the Territory, enacted to prevent the spread of fires.

Mr. Speaker, in a most cursory manner I have referred to three of the great resources of Wyoming, the agricultural, pastoral, and lumber interests. These within themselves are sufficient to make a populous and wealthy State. They pertain to the soil—those vegetable products grown solely by nature's laws, controlled and directed in part by the planting, cultivating, and harvesting of the skilled husbandman.

In passing to those resources which have already been formed, which lie embedded wholly or in part under the surface of the ground, known as mineral resources, I believe I may say without fear of successful contradiction that nowhere else in this broad land where nature has been so beneficent have the great upheavals of the past ages disclosed and brought to light minerals more diversified, in greater abundance, and by their peculiar characteristics better adapted to satisfy the wants and skill of man than have been discovered in this Territory. In minerals Wyoming is one of nature's great store-houses. It would take the learning of the skilled mineralogist to enumerate and classify all these discoveries. They include gold, silver, lead, tin, asbestos, mica, graphite, kaolin, fire-clay, salt, and inexhaustible quantities of marble, petroleum, iron, soda, and coal. In the last-named products lies untold wealth for Wyoming.

The oil-bearing area extends over a country more than 300 miles long and averaging from 50 to 75 miles wide, but little developed. There are great flowing wells that have not yet been reached by the transportation companies.

The country has been examined by experts. Actual tests and discovery confirm the statement that as soon as the product can be utilized

Wyoming will become one of the great oil-producing sections of the globe.

The deposits and lakes of sulphate and carbonate of sodium are the most extensive yet discovered on the continent. The iron does not have to be discovered. The ore is found in great quantities of superior quality in many different portions of the Territory. Coal is found in every county of good quality for generating steam and for domestic purposes. In the northeastern portion of the Territory within the past few months great veins of excellent coking coal have been developed. The coal area is known to underlie not less than 30,000 of square miles.

These great resources have scarcely been touched, yet the production of coal last year amounted to 2,000,000 of tons, which, at the doors of the consumers, brought to the miners and transportation companies $13,000,000.

This production is certain; it is not the result of speculation; it is not affected by drought or flood.

The production at the dump is equal in value to 20,000,000 of bushels of grain in the neighboring State of Nebraska. It requires as much labor, as many engines and cars to distribute it as it requires to transport 70,000,000 bushels of grain.

The production has only been limited by the facilities for its transportation.

The demand is double the present output. Should the production increase in the same ratio for the next five years that it has in the past, it will reach 5,000,000 tons. This coal has a widespread reputation from the Missouri to the Pacific Ocean. It furnishes the greater portion of the State of Nebraska with fuel. It provides the power for the engines over thousands of miles of railroads. Without it the Union and Central Pacific Railroads could scarcely be operated. It is the chief fuel of many of the smelters in Montana. It finds a ready market in seven States and Territories.

Unlike in the prairie States, is found in Wyoming in abundance almost every kind of material required to supply the wants of man. Here are marbles of every hue and variety, granite of various colors and qualities, and lime and sand rocks. These, with the lumber procured from the forests, afford the material for the building of towns and cities, the construction of irrigation works, the improvement of farms, for the opening of mines.

The material is at hand for inexpensive structures or for monuments and buildings of the most costly character. These products have already made a considerable commerce between Wyoming and the States east of her that nature has not so abundantly supplied with such material. This commerce, with increased means of transportation, must become very important.

Manufacturing establishments come with capital and a considerable population. Yet Wyoming has already made progress in this direction. In the Territory there is a rolling-mill, large machine and railway repair shops, flouring mills, a glass factory, tanneries, planing-mills, foundries, harness and saddle factories. No country offers better facilities for manufacturing. The raw materials are in abundance for the creation of trade and industrial establishments. Within 10 miles of a large glass factory at Laramie City are all the products that enter into the manufacture of glass, of the best quality and in abundance.

The greatest nations are those that have a great variety of resources. The same is true of States. The rolling-mill, the furnace, and factory give employment for the masses.

If for any reason there is a loss in one branch of industry this year it is compensated by the profits of some other industrial establishment; consequently the depression and suffering incident to the failure of crops in a State strictly agricultural are scarcely ever heard of in a country with numerous developed industries.

Mines of precious minerals become exhausted. The iron and coal of Wyoming will not be exhausted in thousands of years. These base materials are of more value to make a wealthy and populous State than all the precious materials yet discovered on the continent. They enter into the wants and comforts of every-day life. They provide the basis of power and the strength to control it. They furnish the important factor for the road-bed and the steam to propel the carriages and vehicles for the transportation of man in comfort and safety and the articles of trade with celerity. They overcome distance and make us one people, one nation, in sentiment and feeling. Their combined power could not be supplied by all the animal life of the globe.

Wyoming early in her history took an exalted stand in educational matters. The people have willingly taxed themselves for the maintenance of public schools. With a compulsory system the opportunity has been offered and enforced for the education of all the children that have been accessible.

Notwithstanding the immigration, it is believed that the illiterate class over ten years of age has not increased the 2.6 per cent. of the population as shown by the census of 1880.

I do not know of a man or woman who lived a portion of his or her childhood in Wyoming that is unable to read and write. Good public schools are supported in every settlement where enough children can be gotten together to justify the employment of a teacher. The teachers are carefully examined. In all the towns of any size, good graded schools are maintained. A university is supported at public expense, offering a higher education for all children of the Territory that desire to avail themselves of its advantages.

In addition to the public schools well patronized private schools and educational institutions are established. The Territory has not derived a cent from donations of public lands.

The Territory has not asked nor has it received one dollar of aid for the purposes stated from the General Government.

The people last year expended for educational purposes nearly $250,000. They have raised and expended during the past ten years for this purpose over $1,000,000.

INSTITUTIONS.

The public buildings erected and the institutions maintained characterize an intelligent and progressive people. To accomplish what they have done, they have provided the necessary money largely by taxation.

They adopted the plan to meet the greater part of the principal of their obligations as soon as the liability occurred, and thereby avoid an ever-increasing debt. You have not been generous enough to give them one public building. What they have done has been without your aid or encouragement. Few new countries have done better, and in comparison with her accumulated wealth few States can make a better showing.

Of the Territorial institutions maintained I will call your attention to the following:

A water department, at the head of which is a skilled hydraulic engineer, for the purpose of investigating the questions pertaining to the reclamation and irrigation of the arid lands and the distribution and division of the waters of the Territory.

A department of mineralogy, at the head of which is an experienced geologist, to investigate and give free information as to the mining resources of the Territory.

A veterinary department, to prevent the introduction and spread of disease among the live-stock of the Territory.

A fish hatchery, for the propagation of fish and the stocking of the streams of the Territory.

A university, the building and grounds of which have cost $100,000.

A deaf and dumb and blind asylum, erected at a cost of $10,000.

An insane asylum, erected at a cost of $75,000.

A poor-farm for a home for those who, by reason of age and misfortune, are unable to labor, the cost of which when completed will be $25,000.

A capitol building has been erected at a cost of $275,000, a better building than that possessed by fifteen of the States.

A penitentiary is in course of construction which will cost $100,000.

The counties of the Territory almost without exception are well provided with substantial court-houses and jails, and in some instances with good hospitals.

Public sentiment has been in favor of making but few new counties, believing that the benefit to be derived is more than offset by the expenses of extra sets of county officers. The cities, towns, and villages of the Territory are well built and are well provided with good business blocks and are full of comfortable homes. The cities and towns are well governed. There are eight of the incorporated cities that are provided with water-works and five are lighted with electricity. The cities and towns are well provided with elegant churches and good school-houses.

The banking interests, which represent in a measure the integrity of a people, also speak well for our business affairs. Permit me to call your attention to the following data. It is a better showing than has heretofore been made by any new State except those admitted under the omnibus bill in 1889.

BANKING INTEREST.

There are nine national and eleven private banks in Wyoming.

A recent report of the Comptroller of the Currency shows:

That no national bank has ever suspended or gone into liquidation in that Territory. Four private banks have failed only.

That the first institution under the national-banking law was organized in 1871.

That there was not in banking capital in the Territory at that time $150,000.

That the total of the items of resources of the nine national banks of that Territory is now nearly $1,000,000.

Add to this total the items of resources of the private banks, and the aggregate is over $5,000,000. This is as much or in excess of the banking resources of either of four States, all of which have been in the Union for twenty-five years or more.

These States have, respectively, one, two, five, and seven Representatives in Congress.

This table shows the steady increase each year in the banking resources and business of the Territory. It will be noted that at no time has there been any retrogression:

Summary of national banks, the important items of resources and liabilities, and the totals, etc., Wyoming Territory.

Date.	No. of banks.	Loans and discounts.	U. S. bonds.	Cash and cash items.	Capital.	Surplus.	Undivided profits.	Outstanding circulation.	Individual deposits.	Totals.

1889										3,725,000

I desire to make some comparisons, as follows:

State.	Date.	National banks.	Total revenues.	Average.
Mississippi.....	Sept. 30, 1889	12	$1,200,000	$350,000
Florida.....	do.	13	4,278,000	328,000
West Virginia.....	do.	20	7,588,000	379,000
Arkansas.....	do.	8	4,764,000	599,500
Wyoming.....	do.	9	3,272,600	414,000

I should add that two more national banks are in process of organization.

FINANCIAL MATTERS.

The people have managed their affairs well.

They have the best credit at home and abroad. They have guarded their credit at every stage with jealous care. Neither the Territory nor any county, city, or school district has ever defaulted in the payment of any obligation or any accruing interest thereon at maturity. The Territory has not at any time had a floating indebtedness. An auditor's warrant only floats the time it takes it to go to the office of the treasurer. The total indebtedness of the Territory is $320,000. No bonds of the Territory bear over 6 per cent. interest.

No bonds have ever been sold by the Territory for less than 5 per cent. above par and some as high as 12 per cent. premium.

These bonds can not be bought for less than 18 per cent. premium in New England, where they are held.

On January 10, 1890, after every obligation had been paid, there was in the treasury $230,000.

The result of a levy of 8 mills on the actual wealth of the Territory on the 1st day of January, 1890, would, with the cash on hand, have paid every obligation of the Territory, and of the counties, cities, towns, and school districts therein, and have left public property of the value of more than $2,000,000.

During the entire history of the Territory, not one defalcation of a Territorial officer has occurred.

During the past five years the Territory has expended hundreds of thousands of dollars in the erection of her public buildings and not a whisper or scandal has been heard with reference to those who have had control of these matters.

Open the books of some of the States and make a better showing.

WEALTH.

Wyoming is well prepared to take care of a State government. Commencing with an assessable wealth of $6,924,000 in 1870, an increase of $4,333,000 was made by 1880. The property of the Territory was assessed at $31,500,000 in 1889, and this after a reduction was made on the live-stock of the Territory, owing to a depreciation of values, to the amount of $5,000,000. The actual wealth of the Territory is four times greater than the amount returned as the assessable wealth, as shown by the following table:

Items.	Actual value.	Assessed value.
Railroad property.....	$35,000,000	$6,163,000
Live-stock.....	40,000,000	9,000,000
Improved farms and ranches.....	15,000,000	3,000,000
Developed mines.....	15,000,000	Not assessed.
Churches and schools, county, city, and Territorial property.....	2,500,000	Do.
Irrigation works and improvements.....	10,000,000	Do.

For the purposes of the argument I desire to call your attention to the following facts by way of comparison. To be absolutely within bounds let us call the actual wealth of Wyoming $100,000,000. Since no effort was made before the census of 1860 to collect data of the assessable wealth of the several States, I have assumed that the assessable wealth of the several States was 60 per cent. of the actual wealth.

The following table shows the amount of assessable and true wealth of several of the States at the date of admission or at periods subsequent thereto:

	Years after admission.	Actual wealth.	Assessable wealth.
Wisconsin.....	2	$42,000,000	$31,200,000
Arkansas.....	14	39,000,000	23,400,000
Florida.....	5	23,000,000	13,800,000
Iowa.....	5	24,000,000	13,200,000
Oregon.....	2	19,000,000	11,400,000
Minnesota.....	2	52,294,000	32,087,720
California.....		22,161,000	13,296,000
Kansas.....		31,327,000	22,500,000
Wyoming, in 1889.....		100,000,000	31,500,000

POSTAL STATISTICS.

One of the surest indications of the prosperity in a community is found in the statistics of the postal service. The receipts in Wyoming during 1888 were as follows:

Total postal receipts in Wyoming during the last year amounted to.....	$79,235.12
Receipts from the sale of postage-stamps, stamped envelopes, and postal cards were.....	63,974.18
From box-rents.....	6,253.05
Paid to postmasters for compensation.....	53,027.21
For clerks in post-offices, fuel, and rent.....	4,836.57
Clerks.....	477.25

There are nearly two hundred post-offices in the Territory, of which six are Presidential offices.

WYOMING MAKING RAPID STRIDES IN RAILROAD BUILDING.

There are about 900 miles of operated railroads in the Territory.

The principal railroad companies of the central west are locating lines and securing rights of way in Wyoming.

The Chicago and Burlington Railway Company operates a through line from Cheyenne, the capital of the Territory, to Chicago.

The Northwestern Railroad Company has built and is operating a line of road in the central portion of the Territory, connecting with its eastern system. This company has located from its present terminus a road to Ogden, Utah, which will make another through line to the Pacific.

The Cheyenne and Northern Railroad has completed 125 miles of road north from the capital of the Territory.

The Union Pacific Railroad traverses the Territory through its entire length from east to west.

The Union Pacific Railway Company built, during the year 1889, a road to the newly opened coal-mines in Carbon County.

The Burlington system constructed last year a road from Central Nebraska to the fields of coking coal in Northeastern Wyoming. Additional railroad mileage is now under contract that will cost over $1,000,000. Even in the dead of winter engineers are in the field surveying and locating new lines. No less than four transcontinental lines are located across her borders. That Wyoming will soon double her railroad mileage there can be no doubt.

The best constitutions made are those that emanate directly from the people.

The inhabitants of a new State should always be left untrammelled by law or precedents when making the fundamental law.

A constitution should be the result of deliberation and thought.

I do not believe under any conditions the people of Wyoming, not even if granted half a hundred of constitutional conventions, could obtain a better result for themselves than the constitution with which they ask to be incorporated into the Union.

It will bear a critical examination, and an honest comparison of its provisions with those of any one of the State constitutions will not result to its discredit.

The time will not permit me to review it in detail, and sufficient for the present will be to call attention to a few of its provisions.

The people selected from their best men to make it. These were selected without much regard to their party affiliations. They had the best guide to govern them, the experience of the people for a period of twenty years. A young people, without the prejudices of old communities to influence them, they incorporated in the constitution the results of the best thought of those who in this progressive age have made constitutional law life's study.

The constitution is progressive, yet conservative enough to keep the managers of public affairs in the beaten paths which will afford to the people the best form of republican government.

The constitution presented is republican in form and makes no distinction in civil and political rights on account of sex, race, or color, and it is not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence.

The constitution will give an economical government; indeed, less expensive to the people than that under the Territorial system. It creates no unnecessary or ornamental officers.

The Legislature, in the first instance, is small, the two houses being comprised of 16 and 33 members, respectively. The first session may be extended to sixty days only; subsequent sessions, to forty days only.

Special legislation of every character is prohibited. Every safeguard is thrown around a bill from its introduction in either house to its final passage or defeat.

The constitution, in addition to the usual veto power, authorizes the governor to withhold his approval to individual items in appropriation bills. The constitution limits the indebtedness of the State and all political divisions of the State and the expenditures of any one year to the amount of the annual revenues, unless expressly authorized by a vote of the people.

It inhibits the voting of aid or loaning of credit to any railroad company or corporation by the State or any subdivision thereof.

It abolishes the fee system except in a few limited cases.

The constitution protects the rights of the people against trusts and corporations and combinations.

It makes ample provision for public schools. It places every protection around the school funds of the State.

It throws every safeguard around the land donated by the Government to aid in the support of public schools and the building up of State institutions.

The provision most to be commended is that clause that makes no discrimination on account of sex, so far as political rights are concerned. The people of Wyoming after a practice and experience during their entire Territorial life hesitated not one moment on this subject. They were substantially of one mind. The manner in which woman has exercised her right of elective franchise has left few men indeed who would deprive her of the privilege if it were in their power to do so.

The entire article relating to suffrage and elections is worthy of consideration. If a pure ballot and an honest election are obtainable by law, it is provided for in the constitution adopted by the people of Wyoming.

All criticisms of this constitution by the press and people have been in words of commendation.

The Senate Committee on Territories says of the constitution:

Your committee find much to praise and nothing to condemn in the constitution which has been adopted, and believe that the highest and best interests of its people as well as the strength and glory of the Republic will be subserved by its immediate admission as a State. The bill referred to the committee conforms to the bill recommended at the last session of Congress for an enabling act, except as to the method of admission; and with some verbal and unimportant amendments in the text the committee recommend that it do pass.

The people of Wyoming had a high precedent for their action. An act was passed by the Confederate Congress—or the Congress of the thirteen original States—providing for a convention, not to frame a constitution, but a convention to submit amendments to the Articles of Confederation. When that convention met they disregarded the instructions that they had received from Congress, and proceeded to form a constitution for the States, not as an amendment to the Articles of Confederation, but as an original document.

This action of the convention was urged as a reason why the Constitution should not be accepted by the States. The Constitution was a good one, and you are here to-day because of its adoption and wise provisions. The convention that framed it was composed of fifty-five members, and thirty-nine of its members signed it. The Wyoming constitutional convention was composed of fifty-five members, of which forty signed the constitution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BAKER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wyoming may be permitted to conclude his remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. General leave has already been granted to gentlemen who desire to extend their remarks.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the request of the gentleman from New York is that the gentleman from Wyoming may have the privilege of concluding his remarks. There is no objection, of course, if the time is taken out of the time allotted to that side.

Mr. BAKER. I move that the gentleman be permitted to finish his remarks.

Mr. SPRINGER. To be taken out of the time on that side?

Mr. BAKER. Certainly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I may not have been present when the gentleman referred to it, but from his large familiarity with that Territory I should be glad to have his judgment as to the population.

Mr. CAREY. I think our population will run anywhere from 110,000 to 125,000.

The constitution in the case of Wyoming was framed by a convention which emanated directly from the people; and as my time is limited I shall briefly call the attention of the House, especially of gentlemen on the opposite side of it, to the case of Oregon.

Forty years ago Oregon applied for admission to the Union with a constitution which was formed by that people without any authority of Congress. The people of Oregon live under that constitution to-day. In the discussion that took place in the Senate and the House of Representatives, it was declared to be among the best constitutions that had been presented by any people up to that time asking for admission as a State.

I wish also to call your attention to the fact that Oregon stood with two Senators and a Representative ready to be admitted the very moment the bill for the admission of the State was passed. They had elected State officers. Mr. William H. Seward, who was then one of the ablest of those composing the Senate of the United States, stood up and declared in favor of the people of Oregon, notwithstanding that they were here with two Senators and a Representative directly opposed to him politically, championed the cause of the people of Oregon, and Oregon was admitted as a State.

I would like to call the attention of the gentleman of Georgia to the case of Michigan. The people of Michigan were not admitted under an act of Congress, but on a constitution framed by a convention having its origin in a Democratic county convention of Wayne County, in that State.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Wyoming allow me a moment in that connection?

Mr. CAREY. With pleasure.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman will refer to part 2 of the Charters and Constitutions of the United States, under the head of Oregon, page 1492, he will find that the constitution of Oregon when admitted to the Union was framed by a convention chosen under the act of the Territorial Legislature of Oregon, no enabling act having been passed by Congress.

Mr. CAREY. I shall refer to that presently. Now, will the gentleman be kind enough to read what were the preliminaries in the Michigan case?

Mr. SPRINGER. I was not referring to Michigan, but to Oregon. The gentleman said that Oregon was admitted to the Union under a constitution framed without authority of law.

Mr. CAREY. What I referred to was that there was no previous act of Congress. I am glad to hear the gentleman now admit, since he made such a strong fight against South Dakota, that the Territorial Legislature has such power as he states was exercised in the case of Oregon.

Mr. SPRINGER. I never denied it.

Mr. CAREY. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. SPRINGER. In the case of Oregon a convention was held under the act of the Legislative Assembly.

Mr. CAREY. Then you claim that they have a right to pass such an act?

Mr. SPRINGER. They have not done that in this case.

Mr. CAREY. The inhabitants of the new States should always be left untrammelled by law or precedents when they are making their fundamental law. The constitution should be the result of deliberation. The only questions for Congress to determine are whether it represents the wishes of the people and is in form republican.

I want to say to my Democratic friends that from the very commencement of the State movement in Wyoming there has been no written agreement, but an implied agreement, that no political questions in a partisan sense should be discussed in the organization of the State government; and for that reason they did not elect State officers and did not send Senators and a member of Congress here with the constitution. The convention was composed of able men.

No better body of men ever assembled in the Western country than the men who composed the convention; and I want to say to my Democratic friends that from the organization of the convention until its close it never divided on a political question.

I want to say further to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that the convention was composed of fifty-five delegates. Fifty-one delegates, I think, qualified by taking the oath; forty delegates signed the constitution; nearly all the other delegates requested that their names be signed to the constitution. Some of the delegates had to leave before the final revision was agreed to in the constitutional convention. I do not know of a man of the fifty-five members elected who was opposed to the constitution. I believe every man would have signed it if he could have remained until the final revision.

Mr. BAKER. Will the gentleman allow me in that connection to call attention to the fact that only thirty-nine signed the original Constitution of the United States?

Mr. CAREY. Well, forty signed the Wyoming constitution.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Would another election change the result of that particularly?

Mr. CAREY. No, sir. The people have presented the constitution under which they desire to live.

Mr. STRUBLE. You say that that was a unanimous report of the Senate committee?

Mr. CAREY. It was a unanimous report of the Senate committee. Senator PLATT has been over the bill time and again, and this is the result: That is the bill upon which the members of this House will be asked to vote without regard to the three amendments. The bill fits the constitution and the constitution will be put in full operation by the bill under consideration.

The minority report says:

There is no State in the Union which contains such provisions in its constitution; nor is there a State or nation in the civilized world where women are permitted to hold office and vote, except in a few instances relating to school officers.

Woman suffrage is not a new question. It is not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. It is not unrepugnant.

In New Jersey, under the Articles of Confederation, women had the right of suffrage. New Jersey became a State of the Union with woman suffrage. Women were not deprived of the right until 1807. The other States of the Union did not object to her exercising the elective franchise in the State of New Jersey. In England she votes in municipal matters; in Scotland and Wales and in the Isle of Wight; and in Ontario, on the northern portion of our boundary, a province which is as large as the States of New York and Michigan combined, she votes for everything except member of Parliament.

In British Columbia she votes in all matters except for members of Parliament. A law has been passed in Australia giving her suffrage; the same also in New Zealand. I should say that suffrage in some of these instances is limited to unmarried women. But it is not even new in our own country. Women exercise the right to vote and to hold office in the State of Kansas; in municipal affairs, I think in all cases in cities of a certain class.

Mr. KELLEY. In all cities.

Mr. CAREY. In all cities; I thank you.

I want to say further to the gentleman from Illinois that women to-day have the right in seventeen States to vote on school matters.

This minority report is a most remarkable production; notwithstanding my friend had nearly six weeks after the bill was reported to this House, after it had been considered in this House, on almost the very last day he filed the minority report. He gave as his excuse that he had not the time in which to prepare it.

This minority report consists in a magazine article by Goldwin Smith, an extreme conservative educated in England, a man who resides, I believe, in a British province. It consists also in an article of Mrs. Leonard, a most estimable woman, a woman who, I think, has been successful in a political way in Massachusetts. She has been prominent as a member of the board having in charge certain reform institutions in that State. It is said that she is one of the best officers they have in the State of Massachusetts. She has been the peer of the ablest men in this regard. She is a living example that woman has the ability to vote and hold office.

Then comes an article on which the gentleman from Illinois depends, written by Miss Whitney, which is full of beautiful sentiment and full of poetry. He has used woman's argument against woman. If his theory is correct woman's argument should have no weight one way or the other. If she has not the capacity to vote, has she the ability to discuss the question? I desire to call attention to a Supreme Court decision bearing upon this question (Minor vs. Hoppersett, 21 Wall., 162):

The court said:

The United States has no voters in the States of its own creation. The elective officers of the United States are all elected, directly or indirectly, by State votes. * * * It is not necessary to inquire whether this power of supervision thus given Congress is sufficient to authorize any interference with the State laws prescribing the qualifications of voters, for no such interference has ever been attempted. The power of the State in this particular is certainly supreme until Congress acts.

On the adoption of the Constitution, in no State were all citizens permitted to vote, but various and sometimes stringent restrictions were imposed upon the suffrage in the State constitutions:

The right of suffrage when granted will be protected. He who has it can only be deprived of it by due process of law, but in order to claim protection he must first show that he has the right.

No new State has ever been admitted to the Union which has conferred the right of suffrage upon women, and this has never been considered a valid objection to her admission.

After stating in many ways that the right of suffrage is not conferred by the Constitution of the United States and in every way giving the idea, not expressed directly in words, that the question of suffrage is one for each State to settle for itself, subject to certain enumerated restrictions, in which, however, the question of sex does not enter, the court says:

If the law is wrong it ought to be changed; but the power for that is not with us. The arguments addressed to us bearing upon such a view of the subject may perhaps be sufficient to induce those having the power to make the alteration, but they ought not to be permitted to influence our judgment in determining the present rights of the parties now litigating before us.

Being unanimous of the opinion that the Constitution of the United States does not confer the right of suffrage upon any one and that the constitutions and laws of the several States which commit that important trust to men alone are not necessarily void, we affirm the judgment.

United States vs. Cruikshank, 92 United States, page 555, it was cited from Minor vs. Hoppersett with approval:

The Constitution of the United States has not conferred the right of suffrage upon any one, and that the United States have no voters of their own creation in the States.

It was also cited from United States vs. Reese et al., 92 United States, page 214, with approval:

The right of suffrage is not a necessary attribute of national citizenship. * * * The right to vote in the States comes from the States, but the right of prohibited discrimination comes from the United States. The first has not been granted by the Constitution of the United States, but the last has been.

The minority report lays stress on the fact that the vote was small on the adoption of the constitution. Those who vote control those who do not vote. There was no contention about the constitution; no effort was made to get out the vote. The universal exclamation in Wyoming was that day, "Everybody favors the constitution, and what is the use of voting." I have seen important measures pass this House by one vote, and the Speaker would strain his ear to catch that one vote.

Why? Because there was no objection to the proposition. Voters are gotten out to vote for men; rarely will they turn out to vote except in small numbers for or against a constitution or for an amendment to a constitution.

There was no election for officers on the day the constitution was submitted to the people of Wyoming. The Democrats and Republicans in the start said, "Let us have a constitution under which we will be willing to live. We will not elect State officers until Congress says we may."

I have hastily looked up some figures. They are interesting. In 1835 the question was submitted to the people of Pennsylvania to vote for or against a constitutional convention. On the same day, at the same election, a governor was elected. The total vote for governor was within a few votes of 200,000; the total vote on the other question was 86,570. A constitution was submitted in 1838. On the same day a governor was elected. The total vote on the constitution was less than half that cast for the candidate for governor. The question was submitted to the people of New York in 1867 whether there should be a constitutional convention. The total vote cast on this question was 287,947; for secretary of state, same election, 698,128.

Same year, question of prohibition or no prohibition submitted to the people of Maine. Total vote on question, 24,893; same election, vote cast for governor, 103,684.

In Wisconsin in 1871 people voted on certain constitutional amendments. The total vote was 57,750; total on State officers, 147,000. Again, in 1882 certain constitutional amendments were voted upon. The total vote on these questions was less than one-fourth of that cast for State officers at the same time.

These are not exceptional cases. The people do not turn out to vote for or against constitutions. In Illinois a new constitution was submitted to the people in 1870. The constitution made radical changes in the stereotyped State constitution. It was widely discussed, yet at the election the total vote for and against the constitution was about 50 per cent. only of that cast for State treasurer and a Congressman at large.

I think the gentleman from Illinois was the secretary of the convention that made the constitution which was submitted to the people in 1870. Is that true?

Mr. SPRINGER nodded assent.

Mr. CAREY. I am sorry that my friend from Georgia [Mr. BARNES] has left. I merely call attention to his own case to fortify my theory "that unless there is opposition the vote is always small."

The gentleman from Georgia came to Congress in the Forty-ninth the first time. His district gave 9,166 votes; 1,277; 161 votes—altogether 10,604 votes. He came back to the Fiftieth Congress. It is noted in the record at that time that there were for BARNES 1,944. He has written out against that, "no opposition." [Laughter.]

Mr. BARNES. I did not write it, but it was so.

Mr. CAREY. In the Fifty-first Congress he must have had some opposition. There were 6,577 for Mr. BARNES; for Lyon 797. I merely call attention to this to show that where there is no opposition the vote will always be small.

The minority report calls attention to the vote given at the election for Delegate of 1888 and then to the vote cast for and against the constitution. I was elected to the Forty-ninth Congress, and I had a good deal of opposition. In the Fiftieth Congress the Democratic party announced in their papers that they would not nominate anybody against me. The result was that only about half of the vote of the Territory was polled. In other words, I only received about half of the vote of the Territory. There was no opposition.

I desire further to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Illinois in the last Congress reported a bill which included the Territory of Wyoming.

When did my friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] have the change of heart? In the last Congress he reported a bill for the admission of Wyoming, Idaho, and Arizona. Permit me to read some extracts from section 2 of that bill (H. R. 12411):

SEC. 2. That all persons who shall have resided within the limits of said proposed States for sixty days, and are otherwise qualified by the laws of said Territories to vote for representatives to the Legislative Assemblies thereof, are hereby authorized to vote for and choose delegates to form conventions in said Territories; and the qualifications for delegates to such conventions shall be such as by the laws of said Territories, respectively, persons are required to possess to be eligible to the Legislative Assemblies thereof. * * * And all persons resident in said proposed States who are qualified voters of said Territories, as herein provided, shall be entitled to vote upon the election of delegates, and upon the ratification or rejection of the constitutions, under such rules and regulations as said conventions may prescribe, not in conflict with this act.

If the bill had become a law the women would have voted for delegates to the constitutional convention and for or against any constitution that might have been submitted.

He can not claim that he was ignorant of the fact that women enjoyed full political rights, for I was called upon to give my views on the matter in the Forty-ninth Congress before the Committee on Territories, at a meeting at which Mr. SPRINGER was present. I think he presided over this particular meeting, owing to the absence of Mr. HITT, the chairman.

Every county was represented in the convention. There was no contested seat; no complications; everybody was entirely satisfied. The result that was obtained by this action has not only been ratified by the people and fully accepted by the people, but it has another indorsement. It has been acknowledged by the gentleman from Illinois that the Legislative Assembly has some authority in these matters. The Legislature adjourned on the 14th of this month, the upper branch of which was Democratic and the lower branch Republican. They have presented a memorial to this House, and that, too, by a unanimous vote, asking that the Territory may be admitted under the constitution that has been adopted and presented by the people.

If there ever was unanimity in the presentation of a case by a people it is in the case of Wyoming Territory. The Democratic central committee met at the capitol and by a unanimous vote asked Congress for admission. Of the thirty-three newspapers, Democratic and Republican, published in the Territory, all except one weekly paper have indorsed admission under this constitution. If there has been any protest I have not heard of it. Indeed, the great protest is a clipping from a newspaper in Crook County where the rival towns, Sundance and Newcastle, were making a fight on the division of the county. That is quoted as evidence to defeat the admission of the people of Wyoming under this constitution which they have presented.

The early statesmen of our country, actuated by their power of forecast and ambition for the Union which had been cemented by the trials, hardships, and blood of the soldiers of the Revolution, saw the necessity of adding new territory and preparing the same at the earliest possible time to become States of the Union. Their action, as well as that of those who have followed them in the management of the public affairs, has resulted in the making of precedents to guide a people when taking the initial steps to become a State of the Union. Forms have been discarded, and each case has been decided on its merits.

Some States have been admitted under enabling acts; and others with constitutions framed and ratified by the people previous to the passage of any act of Congress on the subject. In all ways have the new States offered themselves. They have been received, and whatever defect of form has appeared in their application has been cured by the acts of admission.

Of the States admitted, Vermont, Kentucky, Tennessee, Maine, Michigan, Arkansas, Florida, Iowa, California, and Oregon were not authorized to form the constitution presented by previous acts of Congress. The same was true of Wisconsin and Nebraska, as these failed to follow the acts provided by Congress. Kentucky became a State with a constitution that was not ratified by the people; Florida, with a constitution that was stored away with the dusty and moldy papers that accumulate at the capitol and was almost forgotten for a period of seven years; California, with a constitution made by a convention called into existence by an unauthorized order of a military governor; and Nebraska, with a constitution framed by the Territorial Legislature.

I defy any one to find a precedent among the twenty-nine legislative States where a people have presented themselves in a form more regular than do now the good people of Wyoming. This people had not a written law, yet they followed that unwritten law which the American only can follow, and obtained better results than could have been possible had they been governed by a solemn legislative act.

Place the true American anywhere, and amid the confusion he will anticipate the statutes that will follow his acts, and will evolve law and government not inconsistent with the republican form instituted by his fathers. The manner in which the people of Wyoming present themselves is to them a high compliment.

HISTORY OF THE STATE MOVEMENT.

The plan followed by the people is best told by the report of the committee. In 1888 the Legislative Assembly of Wyoming memorialized Congress for an enabling act. Bills were introduced in both branches of the last Congress to enable the people of Wyoming to form a State constitution and for the admission of the State. During the last days of that Congress a bill was unanimously reported to the Senate, and an omnibus bill including Wyoming was unanimously reported to the House. There was no further action on these bills.

After the adjournment of Congress the board of county commissioners of nearly all of the counties in the Territory by resolutions asked the governor, chief-justice, and secretary to apportion the Territory into delegate districts, and the governor to call an election for a constitutional convention in the manner provided by the bill unanimously reported to the Senate. The action was taken and the provisions of the bill were followed, the result being the constitution framed and adopted under which the people now ask to be admitted as a State.

The Legislative Assembly of the Territory which adjourned sine die on the 14th of March instant, by a memorial to Congress praying for the admission of Wyoming as a State with the constitution framed, unanimously approved the action of the people in the making and ratification of the constitution. All the people are agreed; there are no contending factions growing out of the proposed admission of the State.

Can we do better than to take the opinions of some of the ablest men that the nation has produced? We may go back to the builders of the Union. Mr. Madison said in the case of Tennessee:

The inhabitants of that district of country were at present in a degraded situation; they were deprived of a right essential to freemen, the right of being represented in Congress. Laws were made without their consent or by their consent in part only. An exterior power had authority over their laws; an exterior power appointed their executive, which was not analogous to the other parts of the United States, and not justified by anything but an obvious and imperious necessity. He did not mean by this to censure the regulations of this provisional government, but he thought where there was doubt Congress ought to lean towards a decision which should give equal rights to every part of the American people.

To Mr. Madison a Territorial government was unsatisfactory. It did not give the people residing therein equal right with those living in the States. His opinion was concurred in by his contemporaries, and Tennessee was admitted with the constitution which had originated with the people and without a previous enabling act by Congress.

The debate over the admission of Missouri was a protracted one. In that debate Mr. Hardin, of Kentucky, said:

The Constitution, when it says "New States may be admitted by Congress into the Union," is silent upon the subject of numbers or boundary, but leaves that subject to the sound discretion of Congress. The manner in which that discretion has been exercised has been so uniform and invariable that it amounts to a law. It is, Mr. Chairman, a proclamation to the inhabitants of all the Territories that whenever their numbers approach to fifty or sixty thousand they shall be at liberty to burst from around them the bonds and chains of Territorial servitude and vassalage and assume and exercise the rights of self-government as the inalienable rights of mankind.

Mr. Barbour, a United States Representative from Virginia, afterwards one of the judges of the Supreme Court, said:

On my part it is contended that the power of Congress is limited to the simple alternative of admitting or not admitting; that even this power is subject to modifications; that they have not a moral right to refuse admission to a Territory whose situation and circumstances suit it for admission.

Mr. Holmes, a Representative from Massachusetts, in this great debate said:

The authority is to admit or not to admit, but not to prescribe conditions. What would be a fair construction of this? Surely not that Congress might hold a Territory in a colonial condition as long as they choose; nor that they might admit a new State with less political rights than another, but that the admission should be as soon as the people needed and were capable of supporting a State government.

In Michigan's case the rule laid down was not less explicit. Mr. Benton declared:

Conventions were ordinary acts of the people. They depended upon the inherent and inalienable rights. The people in any State may at any time meet in convention without a law of their Legislature and without any provision of Congress, any provision in their constitution, and may alter or abolish the whole frame of government as they please. The sovereign power to govern themselves was in the majority, and they could not be divested of it.

Mr. Buchanan, on the same question, said:

The precedent in the case of Tennessee has completely silenced all opposition in regard to the necessity of the previous acts of Congress to enable the people of Michigan to form a State constitution. It now seems to be conceded that our subsequent approbation is equivalent to our protest. This can no longer be doubted. They have the unquestionable power of waiving any irregularities in the mode of forming the constitution, had any such existed.

California presented herself for admission as a State without having lived a day under a Territorial system. The debate that took place was prolonged. The discussion that grew out of this question and Mr. Clay's compromise resolutions was participated in by the intellectual giants of that period. Mr. Calhoun, South Carolina's greatest son; Mr. Clay, Kentucky's greatest orator and the country's greatest commoner; Mr. Benton, the most illustrious man yet produced by Missouri; Mr. Cass, the great soldier, diplomat, and statesman of the northwest, and Mr. Webster, the greatest of all American constitutional lawyers, were just about to close their public careers. But one of them was living ten years later, at the breaking out of the civil war.

These great men had in their youth and during their early public life received inspiration from the actual participants of the Revolutionary struggle. They had been prominent in public affairs for more than a quarter of a century. They were of that generation who had received the infant Republic from its father as a glorious heritage, to be protected and transmitted to posterity. This great debate is memorable also for the reason that Seward, Hamlin, Douglas, and Chase, men destined within a few years to play most exalted parts in the history of their country, had but just entered upon their illustrious careers in the Senate of the United States.

The result of this debate was significant. It settled two questions: first, that there was no fixed number of people required for a new State and, second, that it was the right of the inhabitants living in a Territory of the United States, without previous authority by Congress, to form a constitution and present themselves for admission as a State of the Union.

Mr. Calhoun, in a speech delivered in the Senate in February, 1849, used these words:

I hold it to be a fundamental principle of our political system that the people have a right to establish what government they may think proper for themselves; that every State about to become a member of this Union has a right to form its own government as it pleases, and that in order to be admitted there is but one qualification, and that is that the government shall be republican. There is no express provision to that effect, but it results from that important section which guarantees to every State in this Union a republican form of government.

In the course of a report made by Mr. Clay, from the compromise committee of thirteen, we take the following extract in relation to the admission of California:

There are various instances prior to the case of California of the admission of new States into the Union without any previous authorization by Congress. The sole condition required by the Constitution of the United States in respect to the admission of a new State is that its constitution shall be republican in form.

Mr. Cass, in the great debate on the subject of Territorial government (see Appendix to volume 22, Globe, page 59, 1850), said:

Are not the people of the Territories competent to manage their own internal affairs? Are they not of us and with us? bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh? the same people, with the same views, habits, and intelligence; all, indeed, which constitutes national identity? Ay, sir, and exhibiting by the very act of emigration a spirit of enterprise which commends them the more to our respect. Can not such a people administer their own government safely and wisely? Experience says they can. They have in every instance proved their capacity for self-government, and life, liberty, and property have been as well protected by their laws as by the laws of the States.

And the late proceedings in California to organize a government and the constitution which has been the result, are the best proofs that could be offered of the capacity of the people to lay the foundations of their political institutions wisely and justly. * * * I know of no constitution in this broad Union where the principles of rational and progressive liberty are better secured than in this first great political offering from the shores of the Pacific.

Mr. Benton, in the Senate of the United States, in reference to the objections urged against the admission of California for the reason that Congress had not authorized the people to form a constitution, said:

The fact is admitted, but its consequence is denied. Congress has full power over the admission of new States, and may dispense with all preliminary forms when it pleases and come direct to the question of admission. It has admitted more new States without than with the previous authority of an act of Congress to form a constitution. Eight have been so admitted: Vermont, in 1791; Kentucky, 1792; Tennessee, 1796; Maine, 1820; Arkansas, 1836; Michigan, 1837; Florida, 1845; and Iowa, 1846—eight in all, a majority of the whole number ever admitted, and stretching over a period of sixty years and reaching back to the venerable times of our early history when Washington was President and the fathers of our political church were still at the altar.

Speaking of the constitution, a fair American republican constitution, and one of the best, if not the very best, that has been made * * * and being thus good in itself, it is not to be met by the question, Who made you? It is well made, and that is all the business that anybody has with it. It is a republican constitution, and that is the only test to which all can subject it.

Of the population he said:

Insufficient numbers, not people enough, is another of the objections. And how many are enough? I speak of men who exercise political rights and constitute the States. How many are enough according to the practice of Congress in admitting new States? About ten or twelve thousand, for that is the number of men which the usually required population of a new State would give.

One man to six souls is the usual proportion in civilized communities, and sixty thousand souls would give ten thousand men, and upon that number or thereabouts have most of our States been admitted. * * * We look to the population which sustains a State, which constitutes political power, which pays taxes, gives votes, and fights battles. * * * Let us vote her in. * * * The people who have gone there have done honor to the American name. Starting from a thousand points and meeting as strangers far removed from law and government, they have conducted themselves with the order, decorum, and justice which would have done honor to the oldest established and best regulated community.

The principles involved in the admission of a new State were also fully discussed in the case of Oregon and the case of Kansas, now famous in our history. The Representatives of the great States were very explicit in their declarations on this subject. The committee have called attention to several of these declarations in their report. Mr. Seward, it must be admitted, was one of the greatest of the statesmen of the last generation. In the Oregon debate he said:

I can conceive of a State with a million of people that I would not consent to admit into the Union; and I can conceive of a State that I would admit with a population of forty, fifty, or sixty thousand. She—alluding to Oregon—is to be admitted some time, and inasmuch as she is to be admitted, it is only a question of time whether you will admit her here to-day or admit her in six months hence or seven years. Now, what objection is there to her being admitted now? You say she has not 100,000 people. What of that? She will have 100,000 in a very short time.

Now, what earthly difference can it make to this Republic collectively, these States collectively, or to one State in the Union, whether Oregon is admitted now or admitted next December? The State of Oregon is here of her own free will—is here ready to be admitted. I think there is nobody who doubts that the people are ready, desirous, and willing to come in. They have made a constitution which is acceptable to themselves; a constitution which, however it may be criticized here, after all complies substantially with every requirement which the Congress of the United States or any considerable portion of either House of Congress has ever insisted on in regard to any State. For one, sir, I think that the sooner a Territory emerges from its "provincial condition" the better, the sooner the people are left to manage their own affairs and are admitted to participation in the responsibilities of this Government the stronger and more vigorous the States which those people form will be.

The Constitution of the United States does, in a great many cases, adopt that principle of generalization; that is, fixing certain rules and measurements, all of which must be conformed to before a great public transaction can be achieved; but it has always struck me that it was certainly a mark of wisdom in the framers of the Constitution that, in regard to the admission of new States into the Union, new members of the Confederacy, the Constitution avoided altogether everything like form, everything like particularity, and submitted the transaction always to the uncircumscribed discretion of the Congress of the United States.

Congress may admit a new State which has been organized by the Congress on the part of the people with certain prescribed forms set for them by the Congress of the United States or on the compliance with certain customs which the other Territories seeking admission in the Union may have adopted; so, on the other hand, Congress may admit a new State, as it has on more than one occasion admitted a new State, which had complied with no forms, but which had proceeded at once to the matter of organizing itself without any preliminary application to Congress or any preliminary investigation of it by the people themselves. I think it is important that this should be kept up, that the question should always come before Congress in the case of every new State which is disembarrassed by form, disembarrassed by measurement, and disembarrassed by precedents.

Mr. Douglas and Mr. Dawes were not less explicit in their declarations as to the rights of a people seeking admission as a State. Mr. SHERMAN, in the Nebraska case, said:

It is sometimes said that these new States have too much preponderance in the legislative power of the Government. It is thought that if they have not sufficient population for one member it gives them an undue advantage in the House of Representatives, and that with a small population they ought not to be admitted into this Senate on an equal footing with the great States of New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and other States. Perhaps that is so, but in the practice of our Government there never has been any difference of interest between the small and the larger States. These Western States will be governed by the same impulses and the same feelings that govern us.

I never yet have seen the line of distinction drawn between the small and the large States. There has been no question presented since I have been a member of this body which divided the large from the small States. There is no danger therefore of an undue representation. These small States are increasing rapidly in population. I have no doubt that in a very short time Nebraska will contain more population than several of the existing States. By the time the next census is taken this young State, admitted I hope by your action, will have passed in the race of population and great progress many of the old States of the Union. It requires but very little time for the American people to fill up one of these new Territories. We must not treat them as if their rights were any different from ours.

We might proceed indefinitely to read extracts of the opinions of the men who have left their stamp upon this country's history from the time of Washington until the present, and we will find that they are nearly all of one opinion with reference to this important question.

I will call attention to the opinion of one more of the great men whose names are familiar to every household of this great land, that of Mr. Sumner, one celebrated for his learning, for his ability as a great international and constitutional lawyer.

Mr. Sumner, in the Kansas debate, said:

Kansas may be admitted by Congress into the Union without regard to population or preliminary forms.

To the objection that Kansas had not a sufficient population he said:

In the absence of any recent census, it is impossible to do more than approximate to the actual population, but from careful inquiry of the best sources I am led to place it now at 50,000.

In speaking of it being urged by some that a population sufficient for one member of Congress should be required before a new State was admitted, he said:

But in making this number the condition of the admission of Kansas you set up an extraordinary standard. There is nothing out of which it can be derived from the beginning to the end of the precedents. Going back to the days of the Continental Congress you find in 1781 it was declared that 20,000 free inhabitants in a Territory might establish a permanent constitution and government for themselves. Though this number was afterward, in an ordinance of 1787, Northwestern Territory, raised to 60,000, yet the power was left in Congress and subsequently exercised in more than one instance to constitute a State with a similar number.

He took the ground that Kansas should not be required to have 93,420 people, that required for a Representative, before being admitted. He said:

Out of all the new States only Maine, Wisconsin, and Texas contained so large a population as is proposed to be required for Kansas.

He said that—

Fifteen new States have been admitted with a similar population. * * * But this is not all; at the adoption of the national Constitution there were three of the old thirteen whose respective populations had not reached the amount now required of Kansas.

That the practice of Congress had not been on the basis of requiring the existing ratio of representation for a member of the House of Representatives in the proposed new State.

He said:

The rule might be a reasonable one and might not be a question in ordinary cases, but that it can not be drawn or implied from the Constitution.

He also said:

This ratio is in itself a sliding scale. At first it was 30,000; it increased in 1793 to 33,000, and thus continued until 1813, when it was put up to 35,000. * * * Now it is 93,430.

If any ratio is to be made the foundation, the binding rule, it should be that which prevailed at the adoption of the Constitution, or at least that which prevailed when Kansas as a part of Louisiana was acquired from France in a solemn stipulation that it should be incorporated into the Union of the United States and admitted as soon as possible according to the principles of the Federal Constitution.

Mr. Sumner proceeded to show that in the case of Florida the rule that had governed in her admission was the treaty stipulation under which the Territory contained in her boundaries was acquired.

The admission of new States detracts not from the dignity of the older States, while it magnifies the importance of the Union of States. In the performance of this duty Congress has increased the strength and glory of the Republic. The growth of the nation's power has not been by the sword or through the conquests of battle, but by the building of new States.

There have been victories which have done more for the human race than all that have been accomplished during the same period by the military powers of the world. Without standing armies this nation, through the courage and labor of her men and women in the broad and great West, has reared monuments more lasting than any erected to perpetuate the victories of battle-fields. The American youth are skilled and cultivated in the arts of peace, which prepares them to be invincible in war.

You ask why are the people of the Territories so anxious to become States? If you had ever lived in a Territory it would not require a reply. Your every-day experiences would have answered it a hundred times. Population and wealth avoid a Territory until forced across its borders. The world believes a Territory is without law and order; the term is treated as if synonymous with being the home of refugees from justice and the abode of desperate characters; and more, a true American when living in America wants to enjoy all the privileges of American citizens. These things amount to a constant restraint to immigration and the investment of capital, consequently retarding growth and development.

You who are so fortunate as to live in a great and worthy State, ask yourselves this question: How would you like to have your State become a province of the Union of States, with your governor, secretary, and judges appointed and controlled by influences entirely outside of the Territory, and these appointments often being wholly disqualified by experience and habits of life to perform the duties intrusted to them, yet clothed with power to approve or disapprove your laws, administer your justice, disburse the moneys raised by the taxation of your people?

I will note here, however, that President Harrison has followed the letter and the spirit of the platform on which he became President, and has appointed the officers of the Territory from actual residents, and has in this respect endeared himself to the people of the Territories as no President who ever preceded him. He has said no to the Eastern aspiring politicians, which his predecessor had not the manhood to do.

How would you like always to see your wants the last heeded and attended to, and laws enacted to which you were not accorded the right in their passage to say ay or nay; your demands not complied with, because you are without representation, consequently without power?

Aided in nothing, pushed aside until the last, consequently your time never arriving; your people in the mean time meeting their share of the public burdens, and paying millions of dollars into an overflowing treasury for lands made valuable only by the industry and settlement of your people; restrictive and inapplicable laws enforced against cutting of lumber to improve the farms, mine, and build the town, while the law made free gift to corporations building railroads of timber and other material, and to your people wrongs irreparable being done for a period of years in destroying their only evidences of title to their homes derived from the Government.

Would you be happy? If you were not restless, full of discontent under such circumstances, would you be worthy of the name of American? I now ask you, do you approve of colonial government under the jurisdiction of the United States, except in cases of extreme necessity?

Will you now say to a people, your own sons and daughters, men and women conscious of their strength and ability, you shall longer remain in a colonial condition? What have you done for the people of Wyoming? You have permitted them to breathe the air. You vote an average of $26,000 per annum for the support of a government not of their making, while they expend ten times as much in the maintenance of public schools.

The people of Wyoming are prepared for admission. Of their Territorial childhood they render you to-day an account. What they have accomplished is the best evidence of their true worth. They have made an exhibit of their mines, of their agricultural development, of the growth of their industrial establishments, of their flocks and herds, of their educational and financial institutions. All these are the best and highest pledge that they are prepared to be a State of the Union.

I have said her people are entitled to admission under the beneficent provisions of the ordinance of 1787. They are entitled to admission now under the provisions of the treaties with France and Mexico, which provide that the people shall be incorporated and admitted into the Union of the United States as soon as possible, according to the principle of the Federal Constitution. They are entitled to admission because of the implied pledge you gave them when you organized a temporary government over them. The people, irrespective of party, have presented a constitution republican in form, alike creditable to themselves and the Union of States they seek to enter.

No stories of dissatisfaction with that constitution have followed them in their petition. The question of boundaries, the serving of strange gods, the restriction of rights belonging to American freemen, the upholding of institutions repugnant to our system of government, and inhabitants within her borders who refuse to assimilate and to accept our institutions, do not stand in her way. Neither political party can make a point by now obstructing her admission.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another reason, stronger than any written law could be, more overwhelming in its influence, all powerful in their behalf.

The people, from the very foundation of the Government, have been opposed to the provincial system; it is obnoxious to their sense of justice and fair play. They believe in "home rule," local self-government. The wrongs of omission and commission to the Northwest have intensified public sentiment against it. No true American ever defended it a day beyond its absolute necessity; he has only apologized for its existence. It is not a part of our Federal system. It has nothing to do with our Union of States. The American people are overwhelmingly against it and stand ever ready to destroy it.

May not the people of Wyoming to-day turn with confidence to the Representatives of the thirteen original States who emerged from the provincial condition and made the American Union possible—may they not look also to the Representatives of the twenty-nine legislative States and feel assured that you will deal with them as a great and generous Republic dealt with your people when they were seeking admission as States?

Many of yours are old and powerful States. Wyoming, young and enterprising, rich in resources, with Western ambition and strength, will hasten to overtake you, and at your side bear a State's share of the burdens and responsibilities of the Republic. Wyoming, full of energy, full of hope, patient until well prepared with the constitution of her own making, now asks of you, the Representatives of the American people, the choicest gift and blessing in your power to bestow, to be forever incorporated into the Union of States. [Loud applause.]

[Mr. DOCKERY withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, in the very able presentation of the case of his Territory by the Delegate from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] he stated one great truth which, if fully recognized and understood, as that gentleman understands it, by members generally on the other side of this Chamber, would probably cause them to have less difficulty in arriving at correct conclusions in the matter of elections in many of the districts in Southern States. It would deprive them of the major part of their capital for bloody-shirt arguments in contested-election cases from the South.

It is a fact, known of all men who have ever given any study or attention to the subject, that wherever the people in a State, Territory, or district are practically unanimous in favor of a proposition the vote will be small, whether the question be the election of an officer or the adoption of a constitution; and the fact that the vote was small in the case in hand is, to my mind, an argument in favor of the popularity of this constitution with the people of Wyoming.

It is now the chief argument of certain gentlemen in both branches of Congress and the radical Republican newspapers that the small vote polled in many of the Congressional districts of the Southern States is due to the intimidation of colored voters or to throwing out and fraudulently refusing to count those cast for the Republican candidate.

In many districts in the South a competent and suitable candidate of honest character and of Republican faith can not be found, and a majority of the colored people have sense enough to know it; they have not forgotten the conduct of the gang of thieves and incapables who led them in reconstruction times, and hence do not care to vote.

When the Republicans have no candidate or one who does not command their respect and confidence, they do not vote; and when such a state of things in a district is apparent less than half the Democrats (mostly white men) do not care to leave their business to go to the polling places to vote. And in such districts there is no disturbance and perhaps not a single challenge of the vote of any man offering to vote anywhere within the district.

It is frequently the case that large numbers of voters of both races remain at home busy at honest toil upon their farms and do not know when election day for members of Congress arrives. When the election of State and county officers is held on a different day, as in my State, the election of a member of Congress is an exceedingly quiet and tame affair; yet it is a regular stock argument with many Republicans that intimidation has stalked forth on stilts through these districts and done this work. Nothing is more absurd. Such arguments are attributable either to ignorance or malice.

In the district I have the honor to represent there are about 30,000 voters, as shown by the last census, nearly equally divided between the two races, the colored having, by actual count at the Census Office, in round numbers 1,100 majority. The two races stand politically divided about as follows: Of the whites, 1 per cent. is Republican; of the colored, about 15 per cent. is Democratic. At the election to the Fiftieth Congress I received 6,666 votes and had no opposition; yet it was charged by some of the Republican newspapers that my election was secured by intimidation. Why, sir, the Republicans had no candidate. Were they prevented from making a nomination? Where is the evidence of it? I will pay a reward of $1,000 to any one who will produce proof of a single instance where any voter within the Third district of Alabama was intimidated and prevented from voting as he pleased at any Congressional election during the nine years I have had the honor to be a Representative here. And I have no doubt that the same may truly be said of a large majority, if not of all, of the districts throughout the Southern States.

I have not investigated the elections in Wyoming as to the convention or ratification of their constitution. I am loath to believe that the Democrats of the Territory approve this constitution. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNES] presented, by clear and unmistakable statements of fact, the irregularity with which the convention was elected or claimed to be elected and this constitution framed, but the fact, if it be a fact, of the unanimity of the people in indorsing the constitution is, to a great extent, a waiver so far as they are concerned of any such irregularity.

I find that the constitutional provisions for the admission of new States are quite limited and practically leave the whole matter to the discretion of Congress. Section 3, Article IV, provides that—

New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union.

And the next paragraph provides that—

The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

And the fourth section provides that—

The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, etc.

These are all the provisions which can be construed as bearing upon the question of the powers of Congress or the limitations imposed by the Constitution in respect to the admission of new States. It is therefore left to the sound discretion of Congress to determine when and in what cases new States shall be admitted.

The principle of allowing the people within a State to determine the question of the elective franchise is one that has always been recognized in the United States, with one notable exception. When eleven States which had tried to get out of the Union never were out according to the Supreme Court, and yet were not in according to the Congress of the United States, their suffrage was regulated for them by Congress and the Army. Their people, though among the most intelligent in the world, were not allowed to determine who should exercise the suffrage within their respective jurisdictions, and I believe that is the only exception.

It does not follow, however, that where the people of a Territory have exercised this right in framing a constitution they should be admitted as a State of this Union. Other questions are to be considered.

The constitution which Wyoming presents did not originate in the usual or regular way. The convention which framed it was not elected and did not convene in pursuance of an enabling act passed by Congress. There was no law to regulate that election, and hence no means of preventing fraud or bribery, and hence good men who may have been opposed to the convention and to the constitution may have regarded the whole thing as a farce and thought that Congress would so regard it.

The suffrage clause in the constitution presented for our action is an innovation—a new departure—as no State has ever been admitted into the Union with woman suffrage provided for in its constitution. The Delegate from Wyoming cited New Jersey as an instance. I do not know whether it was by statute or constitutional provision, nor does it matter. If not unfortunate for the gentleman's cause, it is, to say the least, not a very strong argument in favor of the proposition, for he says that that State abandoned it less than twenty years thereafter.

Now, this case goes further than the mere securing to women of the right to vote in this Territory. The first clause relating to suffrage is as follows:

The right of the citizens of the State of Wyoming to vote and hold office shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex.

I am opposed to that. I am opposed to the admission of this Territory as a State, first, on account of this provision in its constitution. If this were not in the constitution, then so far as that question is concerned, if the State when admitted thought proper to regulate the suffrage by statute and allow women to vote and hold office, it would be no concern of Congress, as the people would then have the right to regulate their internal affairs to suit themselves, subject only to the Constitution of the United States.

But this is a new departure. No new State, so far as I have been able to learn, has ever come into this Union with such a provision in its constitution, insuring the right to vote and hold office to its female population above the age of twenty-one years, the same as the males.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a very erroneous idea prevails in the minds of many people of this country in respect to suffrage. It seems to be to some a startling proposition that all people have not the right to vote. Some claim that this is a natural right. No claim that ever was presented is more absurd. The right to vote in all countries where it has ever been exercised is a matter of mere municipal regulation. It is not a natural right in any sense. It is a right bestowed or conferred by law.

Some claim that citizenship and the right to vote should be identical, and that the denial of the right to vote is a denial of citizenship. That is not true. The fourteenth amendment of the Constitution defines very clearly who are citizens of the United States. All who are born within the United States and all aliens who become naturalized are citizens of the United States. The child but one year old is as much a citizen of the United States as the man of ninety, both being born here. A woman is as much a citizen of the United States as the President himself. Citizenship therefore has never been recognized as bestowing upon any person or class of persons the right of suffrage.

I believe that a people's government—a constitutional, representative democracy—is the best government on earth. But, sir, it is a delicate and difficult task to maintain such a government. It will not do to make suffrage coextensive with citizenship. The idiot and the child of tender years are citizens, and yet no one, I presume, will contend that either should exercise to any extent the governing power. No republican government worthy of the name can long subsist unless a decided majority of those in whom is lodged the voice or sovereignty of the state are endowed by nature with governing power and prepared by culture to exercise it.

The acquiescence of nations for thousands of years in the assertion of the divine right of kings to rule over them, and ever since that dogma has been exploded a base submission to the rule of one man assisted only by a select aristocracy, show how limited are the capacities of peoples for self-government. A people's government in France, which has cost an ocean of blood and a mountain of treasure, is but a half-way republic, still at the experimental stage, as are those of Mexico and the South American republics.

Our own is the grandest success of any thus far, and yet the United States are but one century old, which is not of sufficient duration in the lives of nations to put us entirely beyond the experimental stage; nevertheless we are so assured of undoubted success that we extend the right of suffrage to a million and a half of newly emancipated slaves of the African race, totally ignorant of the matters of government and never distinguished in the history of the world for capacity to govern themselves in a single instance, and newly arrived foreigners, totally ignorant of both our language and our laws. Under these circumstances, ought any one to be surprised at the corrupt practices prevalent in our elections throughout the country? The wonder is that there is so little corruption. The tree which is tainted with unsoundness and infested by insects in its roots can not bear sound fruit.

Education expels superstition and stupidity; it makes men and women shrewder, more inventive, cautious, and wary, but it does not make them honest, nor of itself make them safe custodians of governing power. It quickens thought and gives subtlety to the reasoning powers; it civilizes and humanizes individuals, but it does not and never can bestow upon any race or nation the capacity to govern. That depends more upon natural gifts than culture. An inborn love of liberty, integrity, superior courage, steadiness and fixedness of purpose, and a high sense of honor are the characteristics which must exist in those or at least a majority of those members of the community, states, or nation in which the governing power should be vested, in order to secure wise, steady, and beneficent republican government. These qualities may be heightened, sharpened, and made more active in the school-room, but they are not acquired there; they are god-given. All of these qualities are found in women only in rare instances. All of these qualities are not at all essential to woman to enable her to fill the sphere assigned to her by a wise Creator.

The high courage and masculine qualities of Joan of Arc, Elizabeth of England, and Catherine of Russia command the applause of men, but it is the timid, affectionate, effeminate, and confiding womanhood which commands our love, makes our hearts and homes happy, produces and matures the best and wisest of men. I like a woman who is a woman and appreciates the sphere to which God and the Bible have assigned her. I do not like a man-woman. She may be intelligent and full of learning, but when she assumes the performance of the rough duties and functions assigned by nature to man she becomes rough and tough and can no longer be the object of affection.

The assertion by the advocates of woman suffrage that giving her the right to vote will purify elections and make them more honest than if men alone exercised the franchise, is but a bald assertion, without any facts to support it. My information, derived from private sources, is that in this very Territory of Wyoming elections are quite as corrupt as in any other place or section of country in the United States. I am told that the buying and selling of votes among the women who vote is a common practice.

That women are better than men in some respects I am proud to concede and assert, but when thrown into the arena of business, its conflicting interests and contentions, and matters of government, they are no more honest than men; and I do not believe that they could ever bring themselves to regard the full measure and gravity of responsibility which the right of suffrage should impose.

In my judgment, woman has a higher sphere, and by nature is not adapted to the business of government. This is no denial to her of the rights of citizenship. Are not all of her rights as well protected by courts and juries, by the law of the land everywhere, as though she had the elective franchise? However intelligent women may be, however virtuous and good, they are not, in my judgment, proper custodians of political sovereignty. In the few cases where a limited franchise has been bestowed upon them it has been simply an experiment. Throughout all the ages it has never been considered a safe step to take in the affairs of government to make women the repositories of the governing power.

In a neighboring Territory to Wyoming, now the State of Washington, woman suffrage was given a fair trial for many years; yet when the people of that Territory formed their State constitution they wisely rejected it, thereby lifting their women out of the slough of politics and restoring them to their own god-given arena.

The Delegate from Wyoming in his enthusiastic advocacy of woman suffrage was not very happy in his citation of her right of suffrage in Great Britain. It is quite true that she votes in all elections except for members of Parliament, but, sir, it is only when she owns the requisite amount of property in England. In other than Parliamentary elections neither manhood nor womanhood votes. It is property that votes; there suffrage and property are yoked together, which is not the rule in any of the States of America.

Mr. Speaker, I do not hesitate to say that in my judgment the franchise has been too liberally extended, too liberally, inconsiderately, and hastily extended. Should we ever reach universal suffrage this Government will become practically a pure democracy, and then the days of its existence are numbered.

Under this clause of the Wyoming constitution making women eligible to all offices in this proposed State, how long may it be before a woman may be sent here to sit in this body or in the Senate? And then you would have the State of Wyoming performing the unparalleled act of sending here a representative on this floor who is not a gentleman. [Laughter.] And you will have to change your code or change the language to be employed by the Speaker; otherwise he would very erroneously recognize "the gentleman from Wyoming." Her presence here would at once suggest the inconvenience of pairing as announced in the RECORD.

Mr. CAREY. I will ask the gentleman whether anybody ever sat on this floor who was not a gentleman?

Mr. OATES. I did not assume that. I hope that it is not the case. But in the case I have supposed, if you should send a woman here from Wyoming, you would have at least one member here who was not a gentleman.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. May I ask the gentleman from Alabama a question? His line of remark suggests possibly a difference of opinion upon a constitutional question. Can the constitution or statute of Wyoming determine the qualifications for membership in this House? In other words, can any provision in the constitution of Wyoming confer upon a woman the right to sit as a member of this House if she has not already that right under the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. OATES. If the Constitution of the United States—I do not remember the exact language—if the Constitution, in prescribing the qualifications for membership here, uses the term "male citizen," then, indeed, no clause in the constitution of Wyoming could confer upon a woman the right to sit as a Representative in this House. The language of the Constitution, if I recollect it, is that a Representative must be a person eligible to the most numerous branch of the General Assembly, be twenty-five years old and seven years a citizen.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. No; the gentleman is mistaken; the language which he cites is the qualification prescribed by the Constitution of the United States for the electors of Representatives; but the Representatives themselves must have certain constitutional qualifications, and those qualifications are prescribed by the Constitution of the United States. If it were otherwise, if the qualification of Representatives were within the control of any State, then there might be as many different rules of qualification as there are States.

Mr. OATES. I will read the clause of the Constitution. It is as follows:

No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I was familiar with the provision, but what I want to do is to call attention of the gentleman from Alabama to this question. The Constitution of the United States prescribes the qualification of the Representatives in Congress, and no provision of the constitution of Wyoming and no statute of Wyoming can add to or subtract from those qualifications. And if under the constitution of Wyoming a woman would be qualified to become a Representative in Congress she is qualified to become a Representative under the Constitution of the United States now.

Mr. OATES. There is no provision of the Constitution of the United States which prevents a woman, on account of her sex, from becoming a member of Congress.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Wyoming can not confer it upon her if she does not have it under the Constitution of the United States. All Wyoming can do is to elect a Representative who at the time of the election has the prescribed qualification.

Mr. OATES. I admit that, and am fully aware that there is nothing in the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution of the United States to prohibit a woman, if she is eligible under the constitution of Wyoming. There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States to exclude her.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I hope my friend from Alabama will not commit himself to that doctrine, because if Wyoming is admitted that exact state of the case may arise. My friend may choose to leave the matter open for him to decide hereafter whether the Constitution of the United States admits ladies or not as Representatives in Congress. He should not commit himself on that question.

Mr. OATES. I will tell the gentleman from Kentucky that I am not hedging against the future. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAREY. Is there anything in the constitution of Alabama which prevents conferring upon women the right of suffrage?

Mr. OATES. There is. The State constitution limits suffrage to certain of its male citizens over twenty-one years of age, but the State has the right to change her constitution and enfranchise the women, but that will never be done.

Mr. CAREY. Your State, then, is left to decide the matter for itself.

Mr. OATES. I have already stated that.

Mr. Speaker, my line of argument is that women have not been regarded as safe depositaries of the governing power, and, notwithstanding the respect I have for the ladies, in my judgment they ought not to be invested with it. This Territory should not be admitted as a State with such a provision in its fundamental law.

Furthermore, we find in the second paragraph of this section of the constitution the following:

Both male and female citizens of this State shall equally enjoy all civil, political, and religious rights and privileges.

This not only secures to women the right to vote and hold office, but the right to sit on juries, and unless these rights are equally enjoyed the proceeding, whatever it may be, will be unconstitutional.

It seems to me that this clause will bring trouble in their administration of the government. Lord Coke said: "These three things the law loveth: life, liberty, and dower." The right of dower in the deceased husband's lands will be stricken down by this provision. It completely destroys the marital rights of husband and wife in and to each other's property, and the right to contract in respect thereto is completely severed. For all business it completely divorces husband and wife. It is a most radical innovation upon both English and American common law. The wife can contract debts, sell and convey her goods and lands without the husband's sanction, and vice versa.

What is there in the society of Wyoming to require such a wide departure from rules which have prevailed for centuries in other States and communities more populous and quite as intelligent? I believe, sir, that it had its origin with certain strong-minded women who overcame a lot of weak-minded men.

But this is a matter for the people of the Territory to settle for themselves. It does not matter to Congress how they do it. It pertains to their domestic affairs.

My next objection to the admission of this Territory is on account of an unusual provision in its constitution in respect to education. It is also a new departure. I do not think any State has ever been admitted into the Union with such a provision in its constitution. The ninth section of it provides:

The Legislature shall make such further provision, by taxation or otherwise, as with the income arising from the general school fund will create and maintain a thorough and efficient system of public schools adequate to the proper instruction of all the youth of the State between the ages of six and twenty-one years free of charge; and in view of such provision so made, the Legislature shall require that every child of sufficient physical and mental ability shall attend a public school during the period between six and eighteen years for a time equivalent to three years, unless educated by other means.

This is the first instance in this country of compulsory education. That does not accord with the spirit of free institutions, and I am opposed to this constitution for that reason. I am in favor of offering fair educational facilities to the people of every section of this country. I believe it to be the duty and the interest of the State to educate the mind of the State to the extent of the primary branches, but I do not believe in the principle of compulsory education. It seems to answer very well for the Empire of Germany, but I do not wish to see it planted in free America.

Sir, I am not an iconoclast. I believe in conservatism. I would offer to the parents of children the inducement of free education for their children, and leave the responsibility on them for a failure to give their children the advantages afforded by this great benefaction; but I would never present to the son or the daughter the spectacle of the father or mother, one or both, arraigned before a court to be tried for the offense of failing to send their children to school and to have the children dragged into court and sworn as witnesses against their parents.

Such a thing is revolting, harsh, and unnatural, and utterly un-American in principle. It is a long stride in the direction of paternal government. The truly democratic and American principle of government is, as applied to both State and nation, to govern the people no further by law than is essential to the maintenance of good order and the administration of justice.

Let American institutions remain as free as the air we breathe. The State should never invade the household and undertake to regulate its domestic affairs. But there is no counting for the radical invention and innovations of the people who compose the Republican party. Compulsory education is an importation from the Empire of Germany or China. Our protective-tariff advocates should long ago have put a duty on it which would totally exclude it from our shores.

Section 29 of the bill of rights of the Wyoming constitution declares that—

No distinction shall ever be made by law between resident aliens and citizens as to the possession, taxation, enjoyment, and descent of property.

This is in direct contravention of the public policy of the United States. It is an invitation to the lords and capitalists of Europe to buy large tracts of land in Wyoming, as they have done in some other of the States and Territories. Such persons now own more than 25,000,000 of acres in large bodies of lands in the United States.

But a few years ago Congress passed a law prohibiting any alien from acquiring title to any land in any of the Territories or the District of Columbia, and did not extend the act to the States because some of the members of the House doubted the constitutional power of Congress to extend the provisions of the bill so far. I had the honor to introduce into this House the first bill of this character, and have introduced one at the present session, which I intend to press to consideration if possible, because I believe in the necessity for it and that Congress has full constitutional power to pass an act prohibiting aliens from acquiring title to lands in any of the States of the Union. But Wyoming declares against such policy in her fundamental law.

All the provisions in this constitution I have read with great care, many of which I commend, but these three are the most objectionable, and are of themselves sufficient to require me to vote against the bill to admit this Territory into the Union of States.

Now, I ask the attention of the House to another point. This bill makes exceedingly liberal grants of the public lands to the State, to be selected by the State. I was not surprised when I heard the Delegate from that Territory say that the people under this constitution could run their State government much more cheaply than almost any other State in the Union, or certainly with less expense than any other of the new States. One reason of that is manifestly the exceedingly liberal provisions made in the bill, which exempt the people from any taxation whatever for the erection of the public buildings, or for the erection of any of the buildings for public institutions of the State, or for the maintenance of a magnificent system of schools.

The fourth section of the bill grants sections numbered 16 and 36 in every township of the State for public schools, which is the usual grant in the new States and is entirely free from objection. The seventh section of the bill, in concord with the other and in accord with the precedents heretofore established, grants 5 per cent. of the sales of the public lands to the State for educational purposes. The sixth section of the bill grants fifty sections of the public lands within the State for the purpose of the erection of public buildings at the capital of the State. There is another grant further on in the bill for the same purpose, to which I shall presently refer. Section 8 grants seventy-two sections of land for a State university and one section for a fish hatchery. The ninth section of the bill reads as follows:

SEC. 9. That the penitentiary at Laramie City, Wyo., and all lands connected therewith and set apart and reserved therefor, and the personal property of the United States now being in the Territory of Wyoming and which has been in use in the said Territory in the administration of the Territorial government, including books and records, and the property used at the constitutional convention which convened at Cheyenne in the month of September, 1899, are hereby granted and donated and unexpended appropriations of money therefor are hereby granted and donated to the State of Wyoming.

That is comparatively free from objection, but I cite it to show the extent of the grant. As to the number of acres covered by the words "all lands connected therewith" we are not informed. Section 10 donates 90,000 acres of the public land for an agricultural college. The first paragraph of section 11 grants 30,000 acres in lieu of swamp and overflowed lands. I do not suppose that there is an acre of swamp or overflowed land, properly belonging to that classification, in that Territory.

Mr. MCADOO. Will the gentleman allow me a question just here?

Mr. OATES. Let me get through with the land-grant question first, unless it pertains to this part of the subject.

Mr. MCADOO. It does. I wish to inquire if there is any limit fixed in the bill as to the purchase of these lands—the quantity that may be purchased by any one person.

Mr. OATES. There is a limit as to the price. None of it is to be sold for less than $10 per acre.

Mr. MCADOO. But can the purchaser buy a thousand acres or more if he sees fit?

Mr. OATES. One purchaser can buy the whole of it under this bill. It may be bought by a syndicate of foreign capitalists.

Mr. MCADOO. That is it. There is no limit, then?

Mr. OATES. No, sir; only in price.

Then by the same section there is a further grant for the insane asylum, 30,000 acres; for penal, reform, or educational institutions in course of construction in Carbon County, 30,000 acres; for the penitentiary in Albany County, 30,000 acres; for the fish-hatchery in Albany County, 5,000 acres; for the deaf, dumb, and blind asylum in Laramie County, 30,000 acres; for the poor-farm in Fremont County, 10,000 acres; for a hospital for miners who shall become disabled or incapacitated to labor while working in the mines of the State, 30,000.

I never knew before that miners were to receive any kind of pension from the State. That is a new departure. They are to be provided with a home out of the bounty of the United States. Why should they be thus provided for while hundreds of thousands of old, tired, worn-out farmers, broken down by honest toil on the surface instead of under the ground, are not provided for? For public buildings at the capital of the State, in addition to those hereinbefore granted for that purpose, 75,000 acres; for State charitable, educational, penal, and reformatory institutions, 260,000 acres, making a total of 500,000 acres; provided that none of the lands granted by this act shall be sold for less than $10 per acre.

These grants under this bill aggregate a total, according to my calculation, of 663,090 acres. None of this is to be sold for less than $10 per acre, making a contribution to this new State of $6,630,900 in land. All of it may be sold to a single individual, even though a foreigner; there is no restriction as to the quantity that may be purchased or as to the purchaser; but only as to the price. I think that is a very objectionable feature of the bill. The grant is enormous in extent and without restriction except as to price.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me a question just there?

Mr. OATES. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. Do I understand the gentleman to mean six hundred and odd thousand acres in addition to the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections granted for school purposes?

Mr. OATES. Yes.

Mr. McMILLIN. It is in addition to that?

Mr. OATES. Yes, sir, and in addition to the 5 per cent. to be paid the State on sales of lands made by the United States.

Mr. STOCKDALE. What is to become of the remainder of the land, if there is any left?

Mr. OATES. I suppose the remainder, if there is any left fit for cultivation, will be bought by the Grangers and Alliance people.

According to the report of the committee the Territory contains about 62,000,000 acres. Of this about 4,000,000 are arable and sufficiently watered to be capable of cultivation.

The State, having the selection, of course would take the lands granted by this bill from these, the choicest and best, and, while the grant restricts the State to sell for not less than $10 per acre, the bill does not fix any maximum, and the State may sell for $50 or $100 per acre these valuable agricultural lands, which would give her an enormous, a princely amount for her schools, penitentiaries, state-house, poor-farm, miners' home, and fish hatcheries.

Of the remaining 58,000,000 acres, about ten or twelve million more are susceptible of cultivation when provision is made for their proper irrigation, but this will require a vast expenditure of money, which, no doubt, the United States will be called upon to make from their Treasury. And it may be that this object has had a potential influence in silencing within the Territory opposition to statehood under this constitution, bad as it is.

Forty-six millions of acres within this Territory are arid and unfit for cultivation, adapted only to grazing and stock-raising. I do not know whether the Yellowstone National Park is included or excluded from the computation.

Now, one other point, Mr. Speaker, and I am done—I do not intend to elaborate this argument—and that is, in respect to the political aspect of this measure. I find on an examination of the report of the committee no information as to the population, and I am utterly unable to learn what the present population of the Territory is. There is no official data upon which to determine positively. It is only set forth as a matter of opinion based on the number of votes polled, which is a very uncertain, indefinite, and unreliable method of determining the population. I find in all of the nine Territories at the date of the last census the population of this was the smallest. It amounted in the total to 20,789 souls, and was divided as follows, namely: Males, 14,153; females, 6,637; natives, 14,939; foreign, 5,850; white, 19,437; colored, 295; and about 140 Indians. And just here I will remark in passing that this grant of land under the constitution for the university and for pub-lie schools is to be used equally for students of both sexes, irrespective of race or color.

Now, while I do not object to offering equal facilities for people of the colored race with those granted to the white people, I do not know how it is in Wyoming, but down in my country both races would prefer having the benefits of public education in separate schools. But that is a matter of taste, and it is for the people out there to determine. Mixing promiscuously seems to please them. If they so prefer and desire mixed schools, I have no objection. And I presume, in view of the provision of the constitution conferring suffrage on women, that they have also stricken down any restriction or difference on account of race, color, previous or present condition.

In this same connection, in respect to the population, I find that the next bill to be considered for the admission of a Territory as a State is that of the next smallest, Idaho, which, according to the census of 1880, contained but 32,610 of population.

I find at the same time that the Territory of Utah contained 143,963, and New Mexico 119,565, and Arizona 40,440. To my mind it is passing strange (but we all know how much party politics creeps into these things) that a Territory with the smallest population should be presented for admission first. The policy of our friends on the other side of this Chamber evidently is to admit the Territories which are surely Republican first, and then, as to the admission of the others, which are probably Democratic, why they will just go and sit down and think about it, and see whether they will let them in or not. This is a most unfair political advantage, which gentlemen may think it is right to take, but I can not see the justice of it. Patriotism requires the true interests of the country at large to be considered rather than mere party ascendancy.

I believe in the principle of admitting Territories whenever they present themselves for admission with a proper constitution and have a sufficient population. I do not believe in keeping people in a Territorial condition after they have a sufficient population to entitle them to a Representative upon the basis of representation adopted by the Congress.

Now, our past experience does not guaranty such a basis as present in this Territory. We have no official information that they have any such number. In fact, it is not claimed by the Delegate in his able presentation of the case of his Territory that they have a sufficient population now to entitle them to a member of this House. I believe the gentleman claimed that they have only about 100,000, and 155,000 is the present basis for representation. It is quite certain that Wyoming has less than the requisite number, on which it is proposed, merely for partisan advantages, to give her one member of this House and two Senators.

The census is now being taken. If that Territory has sufficient population to give it representation in Congress, why is it any hardship to postpone action upon it for a short time only, until the census shall be taken, which will be an official ascertainment of its population? It seems to me it is not. It has occurred to me that the haste which is now being made for its admission is suspicious and perhaps fraudulent; and the same remark would apply to other Territories which are striving for statehood and are not shown by the last census to have sufficient population. Nor is it any guaranty that this Territory will have sufficient population induced and encouraged to immigrate to it from the fact of admission; such has not been the history of States admitted with a small population heretofore in all cases.

I refer to the State of Nevada, which I believe to-day has a smaller population than it had when admitted into the Union. The census shows that there are but 62,260 persons within that State. This Territory is in close proximity to Nevada. Its lands are similar to those of Nevada, and we all know are mountainous and arid plains and incapable of occupancy to any great extent. Had we not better have the satisfaction which the census now being taken would afford?

Ah! but the friends of the measure fear the revelation which that census will make. The Republicans might lose their opportunity of further packing the Senate. They are now hedging against tariff revision and other necessary and reformatory legislation which the people of this country will demand and have at an early day.

The new census would give us certain, unerring, and unmistakable proof of the sufficiency of the population of this Territory if they have it. Why, then, urge its admission to-day? Why not postpone it until next session of this Congress, if you want it admitted only on its merits? The same voting power will be here, with perhaps a slight increase over what it is now. There is no likelihood of the Committee on Elections breaking down, judging from the work they have done in the past two months.

I am in favor, Mr. Speaker, as I have said, of the admission of every Territory, when it comes with a proper constitution and a sufficient population, without regard to its political complexion. I am not in favor of that policy which on account of the politics of their voting population leaves out of the Union and refuses admission to Territories that have a sufficient population to entitle them to a Representative here. It is not only unwise, but absolutely unjust to deny admission to Territories which have sufficient population, because they are Democratic, and to make haste to admit those containing the very smallest population, because they are surely Republican.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

THE SPEAKER. The gentleman has fifteen minutes remaining.

Mr. OATES. I yield that to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON].

Mr. DUNNELL. Before the gentleman takes his seat I would be glad to ask him a single question, if his time can be extended.

Mr. OATES. If you do not take up too much time, I will answer a question.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Speaker, I sympathize very much with the argument made by the gentleman from Alabama. I do not like the suffrage clause of this constitution.

Mr. OATES. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would not vote for it in a constitution of my own or any other State. I do not know how I shall vote to-morrow, but my inclination is to vote against the bill.

Mr. McADOO. Good.

Mr. DUNNELL. But the gentleman let drop one remark that I did not quite understand. He said in regard to suffrage that "when we became a pure democracy the days of the Republic were ended." What did the gentleman mean?

Mr. OATES. I meant to say that, if the time comes, as I fear it may, in the course of events, that universal suffrage, unlimited suffrage, shall be given to all people inhabitants of this country, our Government will break to pieces of its own weight, will become corrupt and go to pieces. I have as deep an interest in the preservation of the Government of the United States as any man and for the perpetuation of the blessings it has bestowed upon our people, and I hope for it, above everything else in political life, perpetuation in its purity as the fathers made it, for the dissemination of blessings to the people.

Mr. DUNNELL. The gentleman gave no reason why he entertained the opinion that the days of the Republic were ended when we had a pure democracy. In the universality of democracy I confess for myself I have no fears of the Republic because of universal suffrage. I have more fear of it in the line of corruption than of universal suffrage.

Mr. OATES. The two are inseparable.

Mr. DUNNELL. Not necessarily.

Mr. OATES. In my opinion they are. We have more trouble from a too extended suffrage now than from any other cause. There is complaint of corruption in elections from one end of our country to the other, and the more the suffrage is extended the more corruption will there be in our elections. I do not believe that every inhabitant of the country ought to be enfranchised and allowed to vote.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I shall not consume the time of the House in discussing the propriety of the admission of Wyoming as a State on the basis of its population or on the amount of the wealth which it may be able to show by statistics which have been prepared with the greatest care by those who are interested in making the best showing possible for that Territory.

At the outset I will grant that heretofore there has not been, either by statutory provision or by precedent, any rule established which governs or fixes the number of people that must be in a Territory before it can properly apply for admission into the Union or which fixes the resources and the wealth of such a Territory beyond the presumed and implied ability of the people to bear the expense and burden of a State government. In support of this statement I publish the following table, showing the population of several of the States at the date of admission, to wit:

State.	Population when admitted.	State.	Population when admitted.
Ohio.....	45,000	Missouri.....	66,000
Indiana.....	63,000	Oregon.....	45,000
Mississippi.....	35,000	Kansas.....	100,000
Illinois.....	35,000	Nebraska.....	100,000
Alabama.....	40,000	Colorado.....	100,000

This will show in each an average population of about 60,000. The Delegate from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] and others who appeared before the Committee on Territories state that they believe the population of Wyoming to be about 125,000 at this time. From other sources considered reliable, I am told that the population will not exceed 75,000, less than half the number required to elect a member of Congress under the present apportionment.

There has been a great fluctuation in the votes cast at different times. In 1888 there were cast 18,210 votes, in 1886 only 9,377, while in 1884 the returns showed 12,820. I am unable to explain these facts unless the population is constantly shifting.

In the matter of actual and assessable wealth I will quote the table and showing of the Delegate, who says:

The assessable property of the Territory increased from $6,924,357 in 1870 to $11,257,344 in 1880 and to $31,500,000 in 1889, and this, too, with a reduction in the live-stock assessment of $5,000,000 in 1888-'89. The actual wealth of the Territory is not less than four times the assessable wealth.

By way of illustration I need but call attention to the difference between the assessed and actual value of three or four kinds of property in the Territory:

	Actual value.	Assessed value.
The railroad property .....	$35,000,000	$6,163,000
Irrigation works and improvements .....	10,000,000	Not assessed.
Live-stock .....	40,000,000	9,000,000
Improved farms and ranches .....	15,000,000	3,000,000
Developed mines .....	15,000,000	Not assessed.
Churches and schools, county, city, and Territorial property .....	2,500,000	Do.

But to be certain let us call the actual wealth of Wyoming $100,000,000. From this it will be seen, if the estimates are correct, how tenderly they treat the great land grant railroad corporations, whose property of $35,000,000 is only assessed at $6,163,000, and how exceedingly liberal they are with the millionaire mine-owners, many of whom no doubt are the rich and titled nabobs of Europe, whose mines, estimated at $15,000,000, are not assessed at all. But, sir, this is a Republican Territory! It is to be hoped that if it shall be admitted as a State the people will inaugurate a new system and transfer some of the burdens of taxation from the backs of the farmers and laborers to railroads and mines.

I do not believe in holding rich and populous Territories in a state of tutelage or dependence. I believe firmly in the right of local self-government. I believe, as was announced by Chief-Justice Taney (in 19 Howard, 446) that all territory acquired by the United States was "acquired to become a State, and not to be held as a colony and governed by Congress by absolute authority;" that "Territorial governments are organized as matters of necessity, because the people are too few in number and scant in resources to maintain a State government," "are contrary to the spirit of our American Constitution," and "are to be tolerated and continued only so long as that necessity exists."

When a Territory reaches this point it should be admitted to all the rights of statehood in the Union of States without regard to the politics or party affiliation of its people. Any other view than this is narrow, partisan, and unpatriotic. I am ready now to vote for the admission of all the remaining Territories, including Utah, provided such constitutional and legal provisions are made as will forever settle the questions arising out of Mormonism and the practice of bigamy and polygamy in conformity with the laws of the United States.

The majority comprising the Republican members of the Committee on Territories appear to be acting on a different theory. Of the four Territories, Wyoming, Idaho, New Mexico, and Arizona, asking admission, they have taken up and are pressing Wyoming, which in point of population and resources is least worthy of them all. They have favorably reported and placed on the Calendar a bill for the admission of Idaho. Both of these are considered by them to be safely Republican. New Mexico, with far greater wealth and nearly four times the population, and Arizona, equally worthy with Wyoming and Idaho, appeal in vain for recognition. They have each a Democratic Delegate representing them on this floor. Further comment is unnecessary.

With a population of from 70,000 to 125,000; with estimated tax values of $100,000,000; with a good showing for schools and colleges; with railroad, banking, and other business facilities, the people of Wyoming believe they are able to assume statehood, and I, for one, am unwilling to deny it to them on the ground that they vote the Republican ticket. The chief requirement is that they come with a constitution guaranteeing a government republican in form and one which has been framed, promulgated, and adopted in a regular manner.

Sir, the convention which framed the constitution on which it is proposed to admit this Territory was not called in accordance with any law of Congress or the Territorial Legislature and had no legal sanction whatever. As the memorial which I hold in my hand states, the boards of county commissioners of seven-tenths of the counties in the Territory of Wyoming adopted resolutions requesting the governor, chief-justice, and secretary to divide the Territory into delegate districts and call an election for delegates to a constitutional convention. Only seven out of the ten counties took this action. The governor issued his proclamation on the 3d day of June. The election was held on the second Monday of July, and the convention assembled at Cheyenne, the capital of the Territory, on the first Monday in September. The convention should have consisted of 55 delegates. Several counties were never represented at all. Many of those who attended the opening afterward absented themselves, and on the 30th of September the convention adjourned sine die. Only 39 of the delegates out of 55 signed and promulgated this abortive constitution.

On the 5th day of November, just thirty-five days after it was promulgated, the people were called upon to vote for the adoption of this constitution. The Territory of Wyoming is equal in area to the States of Delaware, New Jersey, Kentucky, and New York combined. In many parts the settlements are widely scattered and communication exceedingly difficult.

Several days must have elapsed after the convention adjourned before any authenticated copy of the proposed constitution could be put in circulation. In the limited time, therefore, between the submission and the vote it was impossible for the people to obtain any correct idea of its provisions. No wonder the voters failed to materialize on the day of the election.

The whole number of votes cast on the question of ratifying the constitution was 8,195, of which 6,272 were cast in favor of the constitution and 1,923 were cast against it. At the election for Delegate in Congress, November, 1888, just one year prior to this election, there were cast in the aggregate for Delegate in Congress 18,010 votes. This was the largest vote ever cast in the Territory. In 1886 the total vote for Delegate was only 9,377; but in 1884 a larger vote was polled, namely, 12,820. The increase in the vote between 1884 and 1888 was 5,190. This increase shows about 1,297 votes each year on the average. Assuming a like gain between 1888 and 1889, there should have been 19,307 votes cast if all the voters in the Territory had voted at the time the constitution was submitted. Thus it will be seen that less than one-third of the voters of the State went to the polls November last and voted for this constitution.

There is nothing here or elsewhere to show how many of these votes were cast by women. It is said there are a large number of Mormons in Wyoming; that the women largely outnumber the men. If that be so, no doubt more women than men voted for my friend Mr. CAREY, when he was elected. [Laughter.]

Just here I would like to ask the gentlemen on the other side, why they do not put into this constitution the clause disfranchising every Mormon voter who can not take an oath that he neither believes in nor practices polygamy. They have put it in the constitution of Idaho and are trying to force it into the constitution for New Mexico. Why not treat all Mormons alike? For the very evident reason that the Mormons in Wyoming are supposed to vote the Republican ticket. His politics will determine the amount of toleration which the other side will extend to the religion and practices of the Mormon. But to return to the subject.

This election was irregular. It was not called in compliance with, nor held by, authority of law. No person who voted illegally could have been prosecuted and no election officer was liable in case of making fraudulent returns. It has been reported to us that in many places the election was looked upon as a farce. I have information that in one town in Crook County 300 votes were cast for the constitution in the back room of a saloon and were put into a cigar-box by three men, and that one of them, after casting nearly 300 ballots marked "Yes," for the constitution, said, "Boys, I am d—d tired of voting for the same man all the time. I am going to vote for the other fellow," and accordingly dropped in 7 votes "No."

Mr. CAREY. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. WASHINGTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CAREY. I wish the gentleman would tell us what evidence he has to sustain his statements. I should think his side of the House would be the last to talk about cigar-boxes and ballot-boxes; but I desire to say that I think the election with reference to the adoption of this constitution was absolutely pure. Now, if the gentleman has any evidence to the contrary he ought to produce it.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I make the assertion on a newspaper article, which, I presume, is entitled to as much credibility and conveys fully as much truth and justice as do those newspaper articles that are quoted on this floor from the partisan press from time to time concerning affairs in certain portions of this Union, especially in relation to occurrences in the section whence I come. I will read the article to which I referred. It appeared in the editorial columns of the Sundance Gazette, published in Crook County, Wyoming, immediately after the election:

THE "BANNER TOWN" OF CROOK COUNTY.

One of the arguments used before the Legislature in favor of Weston County is that Newcastle is the banner town of Crook County, and the three hundred-odd votes credited to Newcastle at the constitutional election are pointed to with great pride as proof of the assertion. We should think that that particular election would be given a wide berth, especially by Newcastle. There was no election there on that day, but three persons, each of whom we could name, went into a back room and conducted a cigar-box election. No one else was present, and these men marked the tickets and dropped them into the slot of the cigar-box. How 7 votes came to be cast against the constitution arose from the fact that one of the parties, after nearly all the tickets had been cast, exclaimed, "I'm d—d tired of voting for the same man all the time; I'm going to vote for the other fellow." And he accordingly dropped in 7 votes with "Yes" scratched out.

The cigar-box, the ballots, and a tally-sheet giving the result were sent here, the same canvassed at this point, and with the other, but bona-fide returns forwarded to Cheyenne, where they were duly recorded. And that is how Newcastle came to be the "banner town" of Crook County. The above particulars were related to us by one of the trio who conducted the cigar-box election, and a gentleman whose word is as good as gold. As there was no color of legality about the election in Crook County, the scheme was devised and carried out more in a spirit of levity than otherwise, and it was not thought the returns would be forwarded to Cheyenne and made a part of the record.

I consider that pretty good reading, coming from a Wyoming paper. But to return; the Delegate from Wyoming in his statement before the committee claimed that the vote at the election next November (1890) would be at least 23,000. Assuming that to be true, knowing that 18,272 votes were cast in 1888, it seems manifestly unjust that a minority of 6,272 votes should force a constitution containing so many objectionable features on this people.

The reason assigned for the light vote is that the day preceding the election a blinding snow-storm raged and the next day was exceedingly cold. To what vain subterfuges, alas, will men resort when in desperate straits! The Signal Service weather reports show that on the 4th and 5th of November, 1889, the day preceding and the day of the election, the mercury ranged from 1° or 2° to 25° or 30° above zero and the rain and snow fall amounted to a fraction of an inch. Such was the inclemency of the weather which kept 12,000 voters, male and female, from the polls when the very charter and guaranty of their rights, privileges, and immunities was being voted upon. Why, sir, not even the danger and rigor of a Dakota blizzard would have kept these people from the polls had they known and understood the provisions of this constitution or had they looked upon it as other than a farce and a fraud? I can not make myself believe that they ever dreamed that the schemers after statehood could induce even the reckless Republican majority in this House to breathe the breath of life into this bastard instrument.

What the Democratic minority of the Committee on Territories ask is that the bill under consideration be amended so as to send this constitution back to the people of Wyoming with certain amendments proposed and submit the constitution with these amendments to a vote of the qualified male voters of the Territory at the regular election next November. This will do no injustice to the people; it will not delay the admission beyond the assembling of Congress next December. It will give an opportunity for a full and free discussion and for intelligent action, and will enable the people of Wyoming to say whether they wish to come into the Union with the right guaranteed to women to vote and to hold office.

My chief objection to the hasty admission of Wyoming at this time and under this bill is based on my opposition to Article VI, sections 1 and 2, of the proposed constitution, which are as follows:

ARTICLE NO. VI.
SUFFRAGE.

SECTION 1. The rights of citizens of the State of Wyoming to vote and hold office shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex. Both male and female citizens of this State shall equally enjoy all civil, political, and religious rights and privileges.

SEC. 2. Every citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, who has resided in the State or Territory one year and in the county wherein such residence is located sixty days next preceding any election, shall be entitled to vote at such election, except as herein otherwise provided.

These sections grant and confirm to women the right to vote at all elections and to be eligible to and to hold any office within the gift of the people of that Territory or State, as it may be. In no State in the Union to-day does woman have the unrestricted right to vote and hold office. Several States have conferred the right to hold offices up to a certain grade and to vote in certain elections. I shall not discuss the advisability of such a course further than to say that I am unalterably opposed to female suffrage in any form. It can only result in the end in unsexing and degrading the womanhood of America. It is emphatically a reform against nature.

In the case of Wyoming, I maintain that the Legislature of that Territory never had the constitutional right or authority to confer suffrage on women. The law granting it was passed by the Territorial Legislature several years ago and has never been tested in the courts, but, being in conflict with the law of Congress creating the Territory, it is, in my judgment, to-day clearly unconstitutional. The act passed by Congress creating a Territory and establishing over it a Territorial form of government is to that Territory what the constitution is to the State, and the Territorial Legislature in its enactments can not transcend the power granted by Congress in the organic act.

The act passed July 25, 1868, entitled "An act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Wyoming," reads as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That every male citizen of the United States above the age of twenty-one years and [including] persons who shall have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, who shall have been a resident of the said Territory at the time of the passage of this act, shall be entitled to vote at the first and all subsequent elections in the Territory, and shall be eligible to hold any office in said Territory; and the Legislative Assembly shall not at any time abridge the right of suffrage or to hold office on account of the race, color, or previous condition of servitude of any resident of the Territory: Provided, That the right of suffrage and of holding office shall be exercised only by citizens of the United States and those who shall have declared on oath before a competent court of record their intention to become such and shall have taken an oath to support the Constitution and Government of the United States.

From this section it will be seen that Congress limited suffrage to "every male citizen," as it had a right to do.

By turning to the Statutes at Large for 1853, we find that section 5 of the act passed March 2, 1853, entitled "An act to establish the Territorial government of Washington," reads as follows:

SEC. 5. That every white male inhabitant above the age of twenty-one years who shall have been a resident of said Territory at the time of the passage of this act and shall possess the qualifications hereinafter prescribed shall be entitled to vote at the first election, and shall be eligible to any office within the said Territory; but the qualifications of voters and of holding office at all subsequent elections shall be such as shall be prescribed by the Legislative Assembly: Provided, That the right of suffrage and of holding office shall be exercised only by citizens of the United States above the age of twenty-one years and those above that age who shall have declared on oath their intention to become such and shall have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act, etc.

This section is almost identical, word for word, with section 5 of the act organizing the Territory of Wyoming, except that in the latter the word "white" male citizen was omitted, owing to the adoption in the mean time of the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments.

Mr. MOREY. Will the gentleman allow me—

Mr. WASHINGTON. I would rather not be interrupted just now, as my time is limited.

Mr. MOREY. I only wished to call the gentleman's attention to a section of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Territory of Washington enacted a law similar to that of Wyoming, authorizing female suffrage. That law was finally submitted to the adjudication of the supreme court of the Territory of Washington; and the supreme judge of that Territory declared that it was contrary to the act creating the Territory and therefore unconstitutional. He held that no Territorial Legislature can go beyond the powers conferred or the grants contained in the act forming the Territory, and I think he held correctly. Therefore, female suffrage disappeared in the Territory of Washington; and in my humble judgment it has no more right to exist in the Territory of Wyoming than it had in Washington.

Now, I presume the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOREY] was going to cite section 610 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. MOREY. No, sir; I desired to call the gentleman's attention to section 1860 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Yes, sir; I have examined that section. In the very case to which I have referred the argument was made that section 1860 conferred upon the Territorial Legislature of Washington authority to pass an act giving women the right to vote, and the judge overruled the point. It has been expressly declared by the highest tribunal of Washington Territory that female suffrage was contrary to the organic act; and I insist that it is equally contrary to the organic act of Wyoming Territory. I will read you what the court said, all three judges assenting. I quote from Washington Territory Reports, volume 3, page 617, Bloomer vs. Todd et al.:

The organic act of the Territory, in this respect, furnishes a constitutional limitation beyond which the Legislature of the Territory can not rightly proceed. Congress created Territorial governments, and furnished the rule of conduct by which the government is to exist, and provided the limitations to each branch thereof. Legislation, of course, must not be in conflict with the laws of Congress, under and by which it is organized and the power to legislate is granted, and the rules enacted by Congress limit the power of the Legislature to make laws. * * * The privilege of voting is not a natural right, but a privilege conferred by law. It may be limited or enlarged by the Legislature within its own constitutional limitation of power.

Section 5, quoted above, provided, first, that at the first election held in this Territory every white male inhabitant above the age of twenty-one, etc. * * * and it is manifest that but for this act of Congress the right to vote at such election would not have existed at all. It is, therefore, a privilege conferred upon the class named by that act. It is to be noted also that it is conferred expressly upon "every white male inhabitant above the age of twenty-one years." Had it been the pleasure of Congress, the act might have limited it simply to male inhabitants or have extended it to persons under twenty-one years of age and not have limited it to males.

The same section provides further that the qualification of voters and of office-holders at all subsequent elections shall be such as shall be prescribed by the Legislative Assembly. "Provided, That the right of suffrage and of holding office shall be exercised only by citizens of the United States above the age of twenty-one years and those above that age who shall have declared on oath their intention to become such and shall have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act." These latter provisions in the act of Congress might have been omitted entirely and the privilege of voting remain vested in the white male inhabitant, without reference to citizenship or other qualification whatever, the words "white male inhabitant" being words of limitation as well as words granting the privilege of suffrage and of holding office.

I think this decision is a full answer to the gentleman. I grant that if Wyoming was a State she could in her constitution extend suffrage to all of her citizens without regard to sex. All the States have that right. A case involving this point has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. It is found in 21 Wallace, page 162, Minor vs. Happersett. Chief-Justice Waite rendered the decision. He held that it was competent for the State of Missouri in its constitution to restrict suffrage to "male citizens;" that women were citizens of the United States to sue and be sued, to hold property, etc., but that suffrage did not belong to them as a right. The possession of that privilege in one State did not confer it on women in those States where the constitution of the State denied it or was silent on the subject. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution by the original thirteen States female suffrage existed in only one of them, and that was New Jersey.

Female suffrage has been much lauded of late as the only means left to purify the ballot and to elevate politics. No man has a higher regard or a greater respect for woman in her proper and natural sphere than I have; but, sir, I maintain that, when she assumes to exercise the elective franchise, throws herself into the whirlpool of politics, takes part in ward meetings and partisan conventions, is pulled and hauled about the polls by "heelers" and "bummers," and becomes a campaign orator, instead of refining and elevating politics, she will be dragged from her high estate and sink to the general level of what some choose to call political infamy.

Mr. STRUBLE. I suppose the infamy is with the male sex.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Not entirely; else why did New Jersey give up female suffrage? I will read you the act passed November 16, 1807, by her Legislature. The preamble of that act recites:

Whereas doubts have been raised and great diversities in practice obtained throughout the State in regard to the admission of aliens, females, and persons of color, or negroes, to vote in elections, as also in regard to the mode of ascertaining the qualifications of voters in respect to estate; and

Whereas it is highly necessary to the safety, quiet, good order, and dignity of the State to clear up the said doubts by an act of the representatives of the people, declaratory to the true sense and meaning of the constitution, and to insure its just execution in these particulars according to the intent of the framers thereof: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the council and General Assembly of this State, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, That from and after the passage of this act no person shall vote in any State or county election for officers in the Government of the United States or of this State unless such person be a free, white, male citizen of this State, of the age of twenty-one years, worth $50 proclamation money, clear estate, and have resided in the county where he claims a vote for at least twelve months immediately preceding the election.

New Jersey abolished female suffrage, as the preamble states, for the "safety, quiet, good order, and dignity of the State." I find it stated in the old histories of that time that the women of New Jersey on election day, by changing their dress and bonnet, could and did vote in every ward of a town. I have no doubt it is so in Wyoming to-day, and that they do vote in as many precincts out there as they can reach on horseback or on foot after changing their frocks and bustles. [Laughter.]

If Wyoming should be admitted with Article VI, sections 1 and 2, of this proposed constitution in force, it is not impossible or improbable that in the future some woman will sit in the chair now occupied by the Delegate; she will come with frills and flounces, with bonnet and bustle. [Laughter.] And when she rises and addresses the Chair, how will the Speaker recognize her? Sir, will it be the gentleman from Wyoming or the lady from Wyoming? [Renewed laughter.] Will the rules have to be amended again so as to furnish the proper term of recognition, or will you, Mr. Speaker, recognize her under general parliamentary law? [Laughter.]

It is not beyond the pale of possibility that a woman may be sent to represent this new State in the other branch of Congress. In that event, Mr. Speaker, will it be "Mrs. Senator So-and-So," or "Senator Miss Jones?" How will the presiding officer of the Senate address her ladyship? I say and repeat that it is a dangerous innovation.

I know my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] a few moments ago asked my friend from Alabama [Mr. OATES] whether the Constitution of the United States would not prevent this. The Constitution of the United States says, Article I, section 2:

No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

The Supreme Court has declared a woman to be a citizen, a person, an inhabitant, with such rights and privileges as each State by constitution or statute may confer. I confess to the presumption that she would be eligible to a seat here or in the Senate.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Will the gentleman allow a question here?

Mr. WASHINGTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Do you not think to put a good woman into the Senate might help it some? [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHINGTON. Well, if the gentleman himself were in the Senate I would immediately admit his proposition. [Laughter.] It might be a good thing to supply his place on this floor even with some first-class lady from Ohio.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. And so of yourself.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Oh, Tennessee has not yet adopted any of these "new-fangled" ideas. She has no disposition to take any such new departure or follow any of these progressive follies. Not that we are lacking in respect for true and exalted womanhood in my State. We hold, Mr. Speaker, that the home and not the forum is the place God intended woman to fill. With her gentle voice and her tender hand she smooths the troubled brow and lulls to rest the weary limbs of him who labors for her comfort. Her refining influence, her watchful care at the fireside, molds the mind and forms the character of her sons and of her daughters.

In the home she controls the man of to-day; she rears the pride and dependence of the State in the future; she directs the energy and shapes the legislation of the country with a thousand-fold more potency than she could exercise by the ballot or in the Senate. Brought into rude contact with the coarse world she is either roughened or crushed. As mother and wife in her own realm her hand wields more power than any monarch. Let us not for any party or political purpose drag her from that lofty pinnacle, higher than that which she occupies anywhere in the civilized world, on which American chivalry has enthroned her. [Applause.]

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, if I may be recognized for the purpose of allotting the time belonging to this side of the House, I would assign ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR].

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised that the best argument the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON] has been able to produce against the suffrage feature of the Wyoming constitution is his apprehension of danger that some lady might occupy a seat on this floor dressed in a particular fashion. It seems to me that a case must be devoid of argument when this point is the only reason assigned against such a proposition. The gentleman who wrote the report of the minority of the committee also makes this suffrage provision about the only argument against the constitution of Wyoming.

Now, I would call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee and other gentlemen on this floor to the Constitution of the United States, section 1, Article XIV, which defines the word "citizen:"

All persons born or naturalized in the United States—

Mark the words, "all persons"— and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

The next clause of the same section of the Constitution says:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. This amendment may not possibly be recognized by all of our friends on the other side, as it is one of the modern innovations.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. They are modern amendments, I admit, and I recognize the force of the gentleman's suggestion. They do not seem to weigh so heavily on the consciences of some members as the older provisions of the Constitution. But I will say further they substantially follow the old provisions of the Constitution and were adopted to cure false judicial interpretations.

The instrument as it came from the fathers provides—

That citizens of each of the States shall be entitled to all of the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the several States.

And, according to that very provision, at the time the Constitution was adopted a woman of New Jersey could under it have voted in every State in this Union, for women were allowed to vote in New Jersey at the time of its adoption. I know that this argument has been sought to be avoided by some men, but I have always thought it was a legitimate deduction from that provision of the Constitution.

Mr. OATES. But some of these men who thought otherwise are on the Supreme Bench of the United States.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. I know that.

Now, I desire to call attention to the argument of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNES]. He alluded to the views of Thomas Jefferson and James Madison in regard to suffrage. I wish to call attention to the views of Thomas Jefferson on the question of suffrage, and I think they ought to have weight with the gentleman. He says we ought to guaranty a republican constitution to this State, in the sense in which the men who framed the Constitution understood republicanism. Jefferson says, in his letter to John Taylor, May 28, 1816, defining republicanism:

Witness the self-styled republicanism of Holland, Switzerland, Genoa, Venice, and Poland. Were I to assign to this term a precise and definite idea I would say purely and simply it means a government by its citizens in mass, acting directly and personally according to rules established by the majority; and that every other government is more or less republican in proportion as it has in its composition more or less of this ingredient of the direct action of the citizens.

The further the departure from the direct and constant control by the citizens the less has the government of the ingredient of republicanism.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] indulges in gloomy apprehensions if suffrage should become universal. I do not share that apprehension. I believe with Macaulay that the remedy for darkness is light, and I call the gentleman's attention and that of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNES] again to the views of Mr. Jefferson. I hope that statesman has still some influence with his professed disciples. Said he in the same letter:

If, then, the control of the people over the organs of their government be the measure of its republicanism, and I confess I know no other measure, it must be agreed that our governments have much less of republicanism than ought to have been expected; in other words, that the people have less regular control over their agents than their rights and their interests require, and this I ascribe, not to any want of republican dispositions in those who form these constitutions, but to a submission of true principle to European authorities, to speculators on government whose fears of the people have been inspired by the populace of their own great cities and were unjustly entertained against the independent, the happy, and therefore orderly citizens of the United States.

Further on, defining the term "republican," he says:

On this view of the import of the term "republic" instead of saying, as has been said, that it may mean anything or nothing, we may say with truth and meaning that governments are more or less republican as they have more or less of the elements of popular election and control in their composition; and, believing, as I do, that the mass of the citizens is the safest depository of their own rights, and especially that the evils flowing from the avarices of the people are less injurious than those from the egotism of their agents, I am a friend of that composition of government that has most of these ingredients.

The gentleman from Alabama evidently has less faith in popular government than the great apostle of Democracy who wrote the Declaration of Independence.

That is the view of Mr. Jefferson. That is his enunciation of republicanism, and in that he simply followed out the idea which he laid down in the Declaration of Independence which has become world wide, "that governments are founded on the consent of the governed."

In regard to this question of suffrage in the Territories. It is not a question involved in this case. The question here is whether, the people in any particular locality having adopted a certain form of government and embraced in it a certain rule in reference to suffrage, we are to leave it to them to say who shall be voters in that community. It is the very essence of the principle of local self-government of which gentlemen on the other side have claimed to be such strong friends; and it is republicanism in its very spirit.

Its denial would be a denial of the right of local self-government. One gentleman has said that States should not be allowed to come into the Union until they have a certain number of population, enough population to entitle them to one Representative in Congress. I say, Mr. Speaker, that this theory of Mr. Douglas was never enunciated until he laid it down as a means of retaining the sympathy of the Democratic party of the South. He did not want to break with them entirely; and then he said, for the first time, that it was desirable not to let the State of Kansas come into the Union until she had population enough for one Representative.

But he voted for the admission of Iowa with less than the requisite number; and he never enunciated that doctrine up to the Senatorial campaign of 1858, but he failed to retain the sympathy of the South, notwithstanding this.

The question to be determined in this case is whether the community about to be admitted is one that is likely to maintain in perpetuity a suitable constitutional government, and secure to the people therein the various liberties and rights pertaining to American citizens. Jefferson said this should not be denied in the Northwest Territories to over 60,000 people, and there is more than twice that number in Wyoming. There is no man on that side of the House who has produced any argument to show any defect in Wyoming in this regard. There is not a member of the committee who denies that the Territory of Wyoming has everything that is essential to self-government or who says that it has not organized a system that will secure to the people a permanent system of good government that will protect and preserve the rights of citizens, and unless that can be shown I do not care what may be the number of votes in the Territory.

It ought to be admitted into the Union of States if they have territory sufficient ultimately to make one of the great States of the Union; and on the question of whether Wyoming has that population and those elements of power and prosperity and progress there has not been one single argument presented that would raise a doubt in any one's mind.

Who shall prescribe who shall be voters in Wyoming if not the citizens themselves, and that they have admitted the women to vote is to me a guaranty that a very greatly needed element to secure purity, humanity, and justice in government as well as true republicanism has been introduced and secured in the fundamental law.

Mr. BAKER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. KELLEY].

Mr. KELLEY. The question that has been under discussion this afternoon seems to involve questions that have not been under discussion in this House before recently; at any rate, I so apprehend from the remarks that have been made. I am glad that it is under discussion, because the discussion of this question I have reference to in regard to the question of suffrage will perhaps enlighten some gentleman upon the floor of this House as to the progress that has been made in that direction in different parts of this country.

From the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON] who recently occupied the floor on that side of the House, he seems overawed with astonishment and wonder and even horror at the idea that some day—no far-distant day, perhaps—a lady or two or three might occupy seats upon this floor as members of this House, having the same rights as other members. Now, Mr. Speaker, I see ladies almost every day in this House. Ladies are in the galleries. And I sometimes notice that gentlemen on the other side cast sly glances in that direction; and while I do not see any of them with poke bonnets on—that bonnet that seems so much to disturb the gentleman from Tennessee—I have observed gentlemen from both sides of this House on several occasions “poking” out of the side door, soon to appear smiling in the gallery, seated between two ladies.

I wish to assure my Democratic friends that ladies are no more dangerous on the floor of this House than they are in the galleries; and as my friend from Tennessee is quite young yet he no doubt will live long enough to see ladies occupying seats on this floor, and having votes, and representing districts and constituencies, perhaps even from Tennessee, and doing it with credit to themselves and their constituents.

Again, Mr. Speaker, he seems to have worried himself somewhat in reference to whether a great number of ladies voted for the gentleman from Wyoming or not. He seemed to talk as though that was one of the questions involved in the admission of that Territory: whether many ladies voted for the gentleman from Wyoming. I have not troubled my mind about that. I have no doubt about that; in my judgment it did not make any difference whether they did or not. If the ladies of Wyoming voted for the gentleman representing Wyoming I admire their judgment in the selection of their man. They certainly made no mistake. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. McCOMAS. Would not the ladies if they were here vote, and not refuse to vote so as to break a quorum?

Mr. KELLEY. I would not wonder.

Again, Mr. Speaker, in illustrating the evil results that may follow from the admission of women on this floor as members he seems to have lost sight entirely of the fact that the greatest nation on the face of the earth, save and except the United States of America, is presided over by a woman, and has been for the last twenty-five or thirty years.

Mr. McCOMAS and other MEMBERS. For fifty years.

Mr. KELLEY. For fifty years, I am reminded. And again, Mr. Speaker, in the State of Kansas this is no new question, and I am free to say that I have been astounded at some of the remarks made here to-day in reference to this matter. Now, women are occupying to-day and have for years occupied public offices and have been eligible to office in that State. Many of them are county officers to-day—the county court clerks, registers of deeds, county superintendents of public instruction—and have been for years; and they make the best officers we have.

Mr. PICKLER. Has it unsexed them?

Mr. KELLEY. No, sir.

They are councilmen, mayors, police judges, and they vote for all these officers. It does not hurt their looks; if such a thing were possible, I think it makes them better looking. They attend strictly to business, and when one of the constituents of the gentleman from Missouri came over the line with his bottle of Kansas City whisky and got only a little intoxicated in the city of Cottonwood Falls, and was arraigned before the police judge, who is a lady, and fined $15, and she threw in a fifteen-minute lecture, the gentleman immediately swore off on drinking and the court threw off the fine. This is supposed to be one of the reasons why the gentleman [Mr. TARSNEY] from that district thinks prohibition in Kansas is a failure.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I want to say for the information of those gentlemen that the assistant attorney-general of the State of Kansas to-day is a woman, and she has entire control of the legal department of the State of Kansas, because the attorney-general of the State of Kansas, who, if present, would have that control, is absent from the State, and has been for some time; and in his absence the assistant attorney-general takes charge. Nobody ever complained that she, as a lawyer, did not conduct the legal part of that State properly.

In fact it is universally understood that the assistant attorney-general of the State of Kansas is a much better lawyer than the attorney-general himself. [Laughter.] And I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that if this proposition should become more popular and should extend from some of those progressive States of the West and Northwest even as far as the State of Tennessee, and if it should become necessary for the women of that State to vote in making a selection of Representatives in Congress, they would be just as wise in their selection as were the women in Wyoming, and I have no doubt that the State of Tennessee would be represented upon this floor by gentlemen or ladies just as fit to represent it as the State of Wyoming will be when she is represented here by our worthy friend, Judge CAREY.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am reminded that just opposite me are three or four good-looking gentlemen from Georgia, and if the State of Georgia should ever determine to send two or three good-looking women here to occupy those seats, sitting as I do right opposite to them, I would not be at all frightened. [Laughter.] I would be perfectly willing to stand it, and I have no doubt the Speaker could stand it, and I have no doubt the gentlemen themselves could stand it.

Mr. CLEMENTS. The question is whether the ladies could stand it. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. Well, there is no law in Georgia, I hope, which would compel people, men or women, to come to Congress unless they desired to. We do not have any such laws in Kansas, at any rate.

Now, Mr. Speaker, another objection raised on the other side—I believe it was raised by our friend from Alabama [Mr. OATES], but, if not by him, it was raised by some other gentleman on that side—is that this is a party question, and that it seems to be the determination of the Representatives on this side of the House to force this issue and to admit just as many States as possible because we have the power and because it is a Republican Territory. If that be the case, I want to ask the gentleman how he can reconcile it with the statement and the fact, for it is a fact, that the Democratic central committee of Wyoming send a petition here asking unanimously for the admission of the State.

Mr. MANSUR. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him I think I can answer the question when I say that by a strict party vote in the Committee on Territories you picked out the two Republican Territories and refused to take up the Democratic Territories, which have decidedly larger populations.

Mr. KELLEY. Well, I am not posted with regard to that. I do not belong to that committee, and I presume the gentleman's statement is correct; but, even if it is correct, I do not see that there is any harm to result to any of them, because we shall soon get to the admission of those Territories also.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BAKER. I yield the floor to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOREY].

Mr. BOUTELLE. Before the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MANSUR] takes his seat I would like, with the permission of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOREY], to have him answer whether his objection is to admitting Wyoming before the other Territories or to admitting them at all because it is proposed to take Wyoming first.

Mr. MANSUR. We proposed in committee solidly to tack the four together, and, failing in that, we proposed to tack all four in a resolution and ask the House to take them all up.

Mr. BOUTELLE. All or none?

Mr. MANSUR. No, sir; we recommended taking all four.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Then why do you not take Wyoming now?

Mr. MANSUR. We are taking it now. [Laughter.]

Mr. STRUBLE. And we propose that my friend shall take more of it. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOREY] has the floor.

Mr. MOREY. Mr. Speaker, I will begin my remarks by answering the suggestion that has been made by my colleague on the Committee on Territories [Mr. MANSUR], that the majority of that committee singled out for admission the two Territories with the least population, postponing the Territories which had the larger populations. It is just that the committee should be set right in this matter. The various bills which were introduced into this House and referred to the Committee on Territories providing for the admission of these Territories as States or providing for the passage of enabling acts authorizing their admission were taken up in the order in which they were presented by the gentlemen who had introduced them into this House and had requested hearings upon them, and your Committee on Territories from day to day, from an early period in this session, patiently and considerately heard every man and every delegation who sought to be heard in advocacy of those measures or any of them.

These bills have been reported to this House in that orderly way, after the fullest and most careful consideration. The gentlemen representing the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, to which my colleague [Mr. MANSUR] has referred, were heard immediately upon their application to be heard. Every argument that they saw fit to advance has been patiently and diligently considered by the committee, and those bills are under consideration to-day and are pending upon hearings of parties who are interested in the admission of those Territories as States into the Union. I take it, sir, that the charge which has been made against the committee that it has, for partisan purposes, singled out the Territories having the smaller population, is not well founded in the history of that committee in this Congress.

Mr. Speaker, the State of Wyoming, when admitted, will constitute the forty-third State in the American Union. The organization and the establishment of governments invested with power over the persons, the liberties, and the properties of the people are matters of the highest interest to the human race. The establishment of our National Government and the admission of new States to participation in the privileges and the duties of the National Government from one of the most instructive and interesting pages in the annals of human achievement and progress. The problem of constitutional government based on the free will of the governed was not solved by the struggle which secured our independence of the British crown. It was not until the adoption and ratification by the States of the Federal Constitution, that great American charter of human liberty, that republican government was firmly established.

The character of this great charter is declared in the words of its preamble, glowing with patriotism and philanthropy:

We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

This Constitution became the supreme compact of Government of the people for themselves and for their posterity forever, subject to amendment by themselves alone, in the solemn manner provided in the Constitution itself.

ARTICLE VI.

2. This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

The admission of new States is a power conferred on Congress by the Constitution, subject, however, to certain limitations preservative of the rights of the people of the existing States.

ARTICLE IV.

SEC. 3. New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

The Constitution imposes on the National Government, among other things, the duty of guarantying to each State a republican form of government.

ARTICLE IV.

SEC. 4. The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive (when the Legislature can not be convened) against domestic violence.

In this way twenty-seven Territorial governments have been erected in the territory acquired by the United States by treaty and by purchase. The Indian Territory, although organized in 1834, has never had Territorial government. In this Territory the Indian tribes or nations have furnished their own governments through their tribal councils and legislatures. As these Territories grew in population and wealth and complied with the provisions of the Constitution they have been admitted to statehood, until now there are but six of these inferior governments within the limits of the Republic: New Mexico, Utah, Arizona, Idaho, Wyoming, and Alaska.

The people of Wyoming are knocking at our doors and asking to enjoy the privileges and assume the duties of a great State in the American Union. Has Wyoming population sufficient to organize a State government and furnish the protection of law to her people, their liberties, and their property, and does she come with a constitution republican in form? The Delegate from that Territory estimates the population to be 110,000; the minority report in this case puts it at 72,000. Taking a medium, say 90,000, the population of Wyoming is far above the average of the population of the other States when admitted into the Union. It is not claimed that the limits of the new State interfere in any way with the Territorial limits of any other State. She has wealth, public buildings, schools, churches, railroads, banks, cities, towns, all that is necessary to sustain and prosper the people of a great State. Her people are industrious, intelligent, patriotic, devoted to the Government, and no one has ever claimed that her constitution does not establish a "republican form of government."

The minority members of the Committee on Territories have filed an elaborate report against the admission of Wyoming as a State into the Union. They present two objections to the admission of this Territory—one that the constitution was not legally adopted, so lacking in foundation that it is abandoned by the ablest debaters on the other side—but I shall discuss only one, that which is made the burden of the minority report. They object because the constitution of Wyoming prohibits the denial or abridgment of the right of suffrage on account of sex and requires that ability to read the constitution shall be a qualification for voting. The question is not on the justice or expediency of woman suffrage; the question is, shall the people of Wyoming be permitted to settle that matter for themselves and in their own way? The views of members on the suffrage are not necessarily involved in this case.

Wyoming was made a Territory by act of Congress approved July 25, 1868. On December 10, 1869, the Territorial Legislature conferred the right to vote on the women of the Territory who were otherwise qualified by age and citizenship to vote. This extension of the suffrage was done by a Legislature elected by male voters only.

The same provision of law was re-enacted in 1879 and again in 1886, and has continued until this day; so that for a period of nearly twenty years there has been perfect political and civil equality of men and women in Wyoming.

It is claimed by gentlemen on the other side that this is in violation of the original Territorial act, which restricted the suffrage to male citizens. The gentlemen seem to have overlooked the provisions of the general law subsequently enacted which authorized the Territorial Legislatures to fix the qualifications of their voters.

Section 1860, Revised Statutes of the United States, reads:

At all subsequent elections, however, in any Territory heretofore organized by Congress, as well as at all elections in Territories already organized, the qualifications of voters and of holding office shall be such as may be prescribed by the Legislative Assembly of each Territory.

But it is claimed that this proposition has been settled against the Territory by the Territorial courts of Washington Territory.

We are aware that there was such a case decided adversely to the power of the Territory to remove all discriminations on account of sex in the election laws. But, sir, within the past thirty days the Supreme Court of the United States in the Idaho test-oath case have decided the question in favor of the legality of the Territorial law, maintaining the equality of the sexes in their civil and political rights. I refer to the case of Davis vs. Beason. The proposition is stated in these words:

That at all elections in any Territory subsequently organized by Congress, as well as at all elections in Territories already organized, the qualifications of voters and for holding office shall be such as may be prescribed by the Legislative Assembly of each Territory, subject, nevertheless, to the following restrictions:

First. That the right of suffrage and of holding office shall be exercised only by citizens of the United States above the age of twenty-one or persons above that age who have declared their intention to become such citizens;

Second. That the elective franchise or the right of holding office shall not be denied to any citizen on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude;

Third. That no soldier or sailor or other person in the Army or Navy, or attached to troops in the service of the United States, shall be allowed to vote unless he has made his permanent domicile in the Territory for six months; and Fourth. That no person belonging to the Army or Navy shall be elected to hold a civil office or appointment in the Territory.

These limitations are the only ones placed upon the authority of Territorial Legislatures against granting the right of suffrage or of holding office.

The opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Field, and there was no dissenting opinion.

That woman is a citizen, both of the nation and the State where she resides, and eligible to be a voter, is a proposition too plain to admit of serious denial.

She is a part of the body politic, a part of "the whole body of people" who constitute the nation and the several States. When the framers of the Constitution began the preamble to that great instrument by the words "We the people of the United States," they meant all the people, without regard to sex.

In the case of Minor vs. Happersett, 21 Wallace U. S., page 162, we find the following syllabus:

The word "citizen" is often used to convey the idea of membership in a nation. In that sense, women, if born of citizen parents within the jurisdiction of the United States, have always been considered citizens of the United States.

Discussing the question fully and with great clearness, the court say:

Whoever, then, was one of the people of either of these States when the Constitution of the United States was adopted became ipso facto a citizen, a member of the nation created by its adoption. He was one of the persons associating together to form the nation, and was, consequently, one of its original citizens. As to this there has never been a doubt. Disputes have arisen as to whether or not certain persons or certain classes of persons were part of the people at the time, but never as to their citizenship if they were.

Other proof of like character might be found, but certainly more can not be necessary to establish the fact that sex has never been made one of the elements of citizenship in the United States. In this respect men have never had an advantage over women. The same laws precisely apply to both.

This political truth, as to women, is restated in the fourteenth amendment, which reads as follows:

SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

The enfranchisement of women, then, by the Wyoming Legislature rested upon unquestioned authority on the part of the Legislature to extend the right and upon the unquestioned legal capacity of woman to exercise the same.

After twenty years' experience with woman suffrage the people of that Territory have deliberately formed a constitution to be the supreme organic law of the new State and have placed in that constitution a solemn inhibition of the denial or abridgment of that right on account of sex.

The Territorial Legislature have asked by resolution for the admission of their State under the constitution. The political organizations of the State, without regard to party, make the same prayer. No protest against it has been heard, no remonstrance, no petition against it has been presented to your committee nor to this body.

No one dares to claim that it has not been beneficial to Wyoming and to her people. I quote the following words from a distinguished citizen of the Territory:

It has been stated that the best women in the Territory do not avail themselves of the privilege of the elective franchise. This statement is maliciously false. The women of Wyoming vote with as much universality as men, and no State or Territory can boast nobler and purer women. The foolish claim has also been made that the influence of the ballot upon women is bad. This is not true. It is impossible that a woman's character can be contaminated in associating with men for a few moments in going to the polls any more than it would be in going to the church or to places of amusement. On the other hand women are benefited and improved by the ballot. Most women in Wyoming accumulate more or less property, and under our laws manage their property, though married, as if single. The management of the control and conduct of business necessarily gives them new ideas and brings a knowledge of affairs that none of us get but by experience. This makes them more intelligent, gives them enlarged ideas of life and its duties, instills higher aims and makes them better wives and mothers. The fact is, Wyoming has the noblest and best women in the world, because they have more privileges and know better how to use them.

To conclude this very long letter I will say, woman suffrage is a settled fact in Wyoming and will endure as long as the State. It has accomplished much good. It has harmed no one. We are therefore all in favor of it, and none can be found to raise a voice against it.

The provisions of the Wyoming constitution on this question are found in Article VI, and are as follows:

SEC. 1. The rights of the citizens of the State of Wyoming to vote and hold office shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex. Both male and female citizens of this State shall equally enjoy all civil, political, and religious rights and privileges.

SEC. 2. Every citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, who has resided in the State or Territory one year and in the county wherein such residence is located sixty days next preceding any election, shall be entitled to vote at such election except as herein otherwise provided.

Section 9 of the same article provides:

SEC. 9. No person shall have the right to vote who shall not be able to read the constitution of this State. The provisions of this section shall not apply to any person prevented by physical disability from complying with its requirements.

Shall these provisions stand as the work of the people of Wyoming? The members of the minority say no. In their report they demand that another convention shall be held by the people of Wyoming Territory; and the reason they give for this demand is that "all" may participate in the election of delegates and also in the ratification of the constitution which may be submitted. They recommend that sections 1 and 2 of the bill, erecting a State and fixing its boundaries, be stricken out, and that in lieu thereof a provision be inserted in the nature of an enabling act. As showing the idea of the minority as to the participation of "all" in this election of delegates and the ratification of the constitution which they may propose, I cite the following from the proposed amendment:

SEC. 2. That all male persons who shall have resided within the limits of said proposed State for sixty days, and are otherwise qualified by the laws of said Territory to vote for representatives to the Legislative Assembly thereof, are hereby authorized to vote for and choose delegates to form a convention in said Territory.

Our friends of the minority claim that a new convention should be held in order that "all" who are to be affected by its provisions may have an opportunity to vote for delegates to the convention which is to form a constitution, and that "all" may have an opportunity to vote upon the ratification of that constitution when it has been formed. Yet they provide that in the election for these delegates "male" citizens only shall be entitled to vote. While claiming in this report that they are in favor of "all" being heard upon the ratification of the constitution, they yet provide that only "male" citizens of the Territory shall be permitted to vote upon the ratification or rejection of that constitution.

Here we have the Democratic idea of fair play expressed in legislation. That idea is to disfranchise half the qualified voters of a great Territory who have by their suffrages for twenty years, as well as by their fortitude, their virtue, and their sacrifices in frontier life, helped to build up the institutions and the wealth of this new State. They propose to submit to one-half the voting population of the Territory the power to fix for all time the supreme law of the new State for all her people.

We are asked by the Democratic minority of this committee to undo what "all" the people of the Territory of Wyoming have done; we are asked to set aside the solemn constitution which has been formed by delegates chosen by "all" the voters of that Territory, voters who have been legal electors there for more than twenty years; we are asked to undo that work and send back, not to the people of Wyoming Territory, not to the legal voters of that Territory, but to "one-half" of the legal voters, the question of the framing of a constitution for "all" the people in that Territory. We are asked to take away from half the legal voters there the power to speak for themselves in forming the supreme law of that State for all time to come; and we are told by the minority of this committee that they ask this in the interest of submitting this to "all" the people!

But, Mr. Speaker, that is not all. The minority propose that—

All male persons resident in said proposed State, who are qualified voters of said Territory as herein provided, shall be entitled to vote upon the election of delegates, and upon the ratification or rejection of the constitution, under such rules and regulations as said convention may prescribe, not in conflict with this act, but no educational qualification shall be required of voters at either of said elections.

This minority, this Democratic wing of the Committee on Territories, proposes not only to disfranchise the intelligent women of Wyoming Territory, but to enfranchise those who can not even read the constitution that they are to vote to establish and confirm as the supreme law for these disfranchised women.

The constitution presented to this House was formed by the legal voters of that Territory, without regard to sex. Its provisions guarantee this sacred right against all encroachment for all time to come. More than that, it is provided that no man and no woman hereafter in the State of Wyoming shall be entitled to vote at any election who is not able to read the constitution of the State. There is a proviso, however, that excepts from this requirement those who from any physical defect are unable to read. This clause, Mr. Speaker, encounters the objection of the minority of this committee. They ask this Congress to undo this work that has been done by the intelligence and the virtue of the people of that Territory, and to send back to the male citizens, to the ignorant and the vicious, the power to establish the fundamental law of that State for generations to come.

Not only this, Mr. Speaker; the Democratic minority not only proposed to disfranchise one-half of the present voters of Wyoming, but they propose to break down the barriers which have been erected for the protection in all future years of the exercise of this sacred right. They propose that the constitution shall be republican in form, and make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, except as to Indians not taxed, and shall not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence. Under the proposition of this minority report, all male voters in Wyoming when it becomes a State, whatever their race or their color, are protected by the constitution against invasion of their political or civil rights. Not so with woman. Because she is a woman this minority propose to abandon both her political and her civil rights to the caprice or whim or prejudice of others over whom she can exercise no political influence and to withdraw from her all protection in the rights guaranteed to other citizens of the State.

But the members of this minority do not propose to relieve women from the obligations which they owe as citizens to their State and to the General Government. They provide:

The people inhabiting such proposed State—

That is, all the people, men and women alike—

do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within the boundaries thereof, etc.

The women of that Territory, without having any voice in the framing of this constitution, are made to make this sacred covenant with the Government of the United States.

Not only this; this minority report proposes that if this House should reject this proposition to send back to the people of Wyoming the forming of this constitution, there shall be added to section 1 of this bill a provision that there shall be an election in the Territory of Wyoming on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, 1890, for a Representative in Congress to the Fifty-second Congress, and for State, judicial, and legislative officers. They also propose that—

At said election every male citizen of the United States, who is otherwise qualified under the laws of the Territory of Wyoming to vote, may vote for such officers and on the constitution and separate propositions submitted, and no others, and said election shall be conducted and returns made and canvassed in the manner provided in the laws of said Territory for the election of the Delegate to Congress.

It is not provided that the citizens of the Territory "shall" vote, but simply that every male elector "may" vote at this election. It is further provided that—

At said election each qualified elector may have written or printed upon his ballot the words "For the constitution" or "Against the constitution," and also the words "For female suffrage" or "Against female suffrage;" also the words "For eligibility of women to hold offices and sit on juries" or the words "Against the eligibility of women to hold offices and sit on juries."

But there is no requirement that any such vote shall ever be had. This minority simply propose as a trick that the male electors at this election "may" vote upon these propositions, and then go on and provide—

If at said election the majority of the legal votes cast shall be "for the constitution," the governor shall certify the result to the President of the United States, together with the votes cast thereon, and upon separate articles or propositions, and a copy of said constitution, articles, and propositions.

Mr. Speaker, here is a transparent and palpable trick for the purpose of defeating the steps that have been taken by the people of that Territory to become a State of this Union. They provide that at this election the electors "may" vote upon the question of the constitution and upon these special questions of suffrage and the right to hold office and they then provide that if a majority of all the legal votes cast shall be in favor of the constitution the result shall be certified to the President of the United States and the Territory be admitted as a State. The manifest purpose of this absence of a requirement that a vote shall be had on these propositions and on the constitution was that there might be a default in that election. And in case of such default the constitution would be defeated and woman suffrage with it.

Mr. Speaker, there is still another wonderful proposition made by this minority. In case the two propositions to which I have adverted are rejected by this House, they propose to add to section 1 of the bill a provision that the State of Wyoming shall not be admitted into the Union until the proposed constitution shall be amended by limiting the suffrage to the male voters of that Territory. And they provide that the male citizens of the United States alone, of voting age, in that Territory shall vote in any of the elections provided in this proposition:

At said elections electors who may be qualified to vote under article 7 of said constitution as amended by this act shall be permitted to vote, and no other.

And, now, Mr. Speaker, here is the most remarkable proposition of this most remarkable report:

And if a majority of the legal votes cast on the question shall be for the amended constitution then the governor of the Territory shall certify the result to the President of the United States.

But what if the majority of the legal votes are not in favor of the amended constitution? Why, sir, here is a proposition in this minority report to submit this question to the male voters of that Territory, and if by a majority of their votes they vote to strike out woman suffrage from the constitution then it is to be reported to the President of the United States, and the State is to be admitted. But if a majority, even of men, do not vote to strike out woman suffrage, then it is not to be reported to the President of the United States, and Wyoming still stays out.

And this, Mr. Speaker, is the proposition made by the minority of this committee, who bring it forward in the interest of full and fair consideration by the people of Wyoming Territory. This is in order, as they say, that this question may be submitted to the people of the Territory of Wyoming.

Then they flatter themselves with the idea they have done a generous thing by this people. They say:

It will be seen these proposed amendments will provide for an election for delegates to the constitutional convention, for the holding of a State convention, and for the submission of the constitution when framed to a vote of the people.

That is not true; the proposition is not to submit this new constitution to a vote of the people, but it is to submit it to a vote of half of the people.

Again they say:

If, after full discussion, the people of the proposed State are determined to retain the provision in reference to female suffrage and the eligibility of females to hold office, it will be for them to determine that proposition.

But it is an unfair statement. There is no proposed submission, after full discussion, to the people, as is stated by the minority in this report. It is unfair. It is disingenuous. It is not honest; that is, the report is not.

Not only this; they disclaim in the report any discussion of the merits of the proposition of female suffrage, and yet they adopt as their own language the words of Professor Goldwin Smith, that English-American, in an article entitled "Woman's place in the state." The minority use these words: "His article is hereto appended and made a part of the views which the undersigned desire to submit." They adopt all he says and make it a part of their report.

It is peculiarly like in character to the arguments made on the other side to-day in opposition to the provisions of this constitution in relation to female suffrage.

Our friends on the other side seem to get into a panic when anything is said about the extension or enlargement of the right of suffrage.

Our friends on the other side seem to think if this constitution of Wyoming is to stand as the supreme law of that State that at once the offices of Senators and Representatives from that State will be filled by women, and the great revolution will spread over the land and we will have a Congress here, using the language of debate on the other side, which is not composed of gentlemen. And one distinguished member, my friend from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON], seems to be stamped by the idea that some Representative from the State of Wyoming may take a seat beside him clothed in a poke bonnet and bustle. [Laughter.] That is the kind of argument advanced here on this floor in support of the propositions of the Democratic minority of this committee.

And the minority of the committee take up the same train of thought, which culminates in this grand suggestion:

Some—

Speaking of those who fear and deprecate this agitation of the question of suffrage—

Some are sanguine enough to think that America will have rest when a black woman has been elected President of the United States.

That is the sentiment of the minority of this committee. I can imagine the fine frenzy of my distinguished friend from Illinois, the author of this report, when he contemplates the idea that he may some day see sitting in the Presidential chair of the nation a woman with a black skin. And then our friends on the other side say:

The abolition of subordination in the family, of the authority of its head, and of everything that tends to merge the civil personality of the wife in that of the husband, is the prime object at least of the extreme wing of the party, which would be achieved if man and wife could be seen fighting against each other at elections.

What a fearful prospect it was that came up before the view of the robust minority of this committee. What a horrible thing, that there should be a tendency to the abolition of the legal subordination of woman to man. What a horrible thought, that anything could be done by an American Congress which would tend to do away with the principle of law and the practice which for generations has merged the civil being of the wife into that of the husband. I pray God that the progress that has been made may go on until we have a legal enfranchisement of woman in all the States of this Union, that her legal identity as a member of the human family may be established and forever preserved. I have no sympathy with the fears that are expressed by my friends on the minority of the committee.

Then they say—

That there will be a revolution of the relations between the sexes.

Mr. MANSUR. I raise the point of order that the hour has been exhausted, and if any further time is consumed it will be out of the time allowed for to-morrow on that side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has exhausted the hour.

Mr. BAKER. We have ten minutes that are to be divided, and I suggest that the gentleman from Ohio occupy five and my friend from Missouri the remainder.

Mr. MANSUR. No; the whole of the ten minutes is ours.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired. Mr. MOREY. Then I will avail myself of the privilege of extending my remarks in the RECORD.

A fear is expressed that women, if permitted to vote, will seek the enactment of laws "in their own interest and against that of man."

It is assumed, sir, that the exercise of the right of suffrage by woman will change the relations of the sexes. There never was a greater mistake.

The race is homogeneous and will never be divided in its aims and desires. It is assumed that woman desires the ballot to legislate for woman. This, too, is a grievous mistake. She desires the ballot that she may legislate for the race, for her sons and her daughters, for her husband and herself.

Then the minority grow warlike and shake their gory locks at the peaceful female suffragists. Let me read from their report:

But the fact is that muscle has a great deal to do with the matter. Why has the male sex alone made the laws? Because law, with whatever majesty we may invest it, is will, which, to give it effect, must be backed by force, and the force of the community is male. As Gail Hamilton quaintly but forcibly expressed it, "every ballot is a bullet." Muscle is the coarse foundation on which the most intellectual and august fabric of legislation rests. Divorce the law from the force of the community and the law will become ineffectual. If the case of the Queen regnant is cited, the answer is that a Queen regnant has the public force at her back. Suppose the women, when invested with political power, were to make the laws which they threaten to make in their own interest and against that of the man, would the men execute the law against themselves?

Sir, these suggestions are as untrue as they are coarse. In the United States the law is our sovereign and to it the patriotism of our people yields an unhesitating obedience.

Out of 60,000,000 people only about 12,000,000 vote, and still the other 48,000,000, a great majority of whom are able to make physical resistance, if so inclined, stand ready to vindicate by their lives if need be the majesty of the laws which they have had no voice in making.

A simple answer, however, to the question of the minority, "Why has the male sex alone made the laws?" is that the female sex have forever been denied the right to help make the laws by which they are governed.

To attribute this to their lack of physical courage is neither just nor manly. I have read in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the autobiography of my friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and from that I learn that while the great war for the Union was testing the patriotism and valor of the American people my friend was taking lessons in statesmanship at home. What were the women of the country doing then? Anna Ella Carroll, moved by the loftiest patriotism, her genius quickened by her love of country, was the friend and counselor of the great Lincoln and lighted his way in the gloom of that awful period.

Who has not read of Dorothea Dix and the army of noble nurses; of Elizabeth Blackwell and the Sanitary Commission? Who has not read of Clara Barton, whose chosen work was on the field of battle, caring for the wounded, burying the dead? For four years she endured the rigors and was exposed to the dangers of soldier life. Shrinkling from no danger, she stood side by side with the surgeons on the field of battle, exposed to shot and shell, her clothing pierced by balls and torn by shot. There was Mother Bickerdyke, who was a strong woman in her prime during the dark hour of the nation. She gave her entire time for four years to the service of the country, laboring in hospitals, going out on the battle-field after the contest was over and viewing those scenes of carnage that make the heart grow sick, lifting wounded soldiers in her brave arms to bear them to places of safety at the risk of her life. And there were thousands of other brave and loyal women who, in camp and hospitals, at home and at the front, and even on the field of battle, did a noble and heroic part in the prosecution of the great war for union and free government.

By what right does my friend [Mr. SPRINGER], who prepared this minority report, challenge the right of the women of the country to enjoy the highest and dearest right that can be exercised under the Government which they sacrificed so much to save?

The minority have called witnesses to repeat stale arguments against woman suffrage in order to defeat the will of the people of this new State, which seeks to be admitted to an equality with the other States, under a constitution framed by delegates of her own choosing and ratified by the suffrages of her people.

In answer to these arguments I will here give opportunity to speak, not for themselves alone, but for all mankind, two citizens of the Republic who, in their lives and characters and in their noble works, have not only honored their sex, but have dignified the human race.

Against the sentiments of the minority, borrowed from Goldwin Smith, I place the words of Mary A. Livermore:

A new day has dawned, and humanity has moved forward to an era where wrong and slavery are being displaced and reason and justice are being recognized as the rule of life. Science is extending immeasurably the bounds of knowledge and power. Art is refining life, giving to it beauty and grace. Literature bears in her hands whole ages of comfort and sympathy. Industry, aided by the hundred-handed elements of nature, is increasing the world's wealth, and invention is economizing its labor. The age looks steadily to the redressing of wrong, to the righting of every form of error and injustice. And a tireless and prying philanthropy, which is almost omniscient, is one of the most hopeful characteristics of the time. Notwithstanding deplorable corruption in politics, dishonesty in business, and immorality in social life, there is so humane a spirit dominating the age in which we live that even the brute creation share in it, and we have hundreds of societies organized to prevent cruelty to animals.

It could not be possible in such an era but that women should share in the justice and kindness with which the time is fraught, and the last quarter of a century has lifted them to higher levels.

The doors of colleges, professional schools, and universities, closed against them for ages, are opening to them. They are invited to pursue the same course of study as their brothers, and are graduated with the same diplomas, and the question of woman's collegiate education is practically settled.

Trades, businesses, remunerative industries, and the liberal professions seek women; and their capacity for public affairs receives large recognition in the United States. They are elected or appointed to such offices as those of county clerk, register of deeds, pension agent, prison commissioner, State librarian, overseer of the poor, school supervisor, school superintendent, executors and administrators of estates, trustees, guardians, engraving clerks of State Legislatures, superintendents of women's State prisons, college principals and professors, and members of boards of State charities, lunacy, and correction. And in all these positions women serve with men, who acknowledge most graciously the practical wisdom and virtue they bring to their duties.

Women are occupying positions as accountants and book-keepers, physicians and surgeons, painters, sculptors, and architects, authors and journalists, clergywomen and lawyers, and when admitted to practice law at the bar of their own States they have the right to practice at the bar of the Supreme Court of the United States. President Grant appointed over five thousand women to the office of postmistress. Even the laws relating to women, which are the last to feel the change in public opinion, usually dragging a whole generation behind—even these are being annually revised and amended, and their fall to keep abreast of the advancing civilization. For the gradual evolution of women during the last half century has led them to protest against the injustice of the laws that concern them.

Lord Brougham pronounced the common law of England "a disgrace to any heathen nation," so far as it related to women. And this law prevailed almost everywhere in the United States until the woman-suffrage movement was inaugurated some thirty of forty years ago. Then began changes in the laws for women, and, legitimately following this gain in their favor, the right to vote has been given them on questions connected with the public schools in fourteen States, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, New York, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, Kansas, Colorado, Kentucky, Wisconsin, Oregon, Indiana, and New Jersey have given women school suffrage on terms and for purposes more or less restricted. So, also, have the Territories of Idaho, Dakota, and Wyoming.

In Utah and Washington Territories women have exercised the right of suffrage until recently. In Utah they lost it by the passage of the Edmunds bill, aimed at the abolition of Mormon polygamy, and in Washington by a decision of the Territorial supreme court on a technicality. In the States of Illinois, Iowa, Louisiana, Pennsylvania, and Rhode Island women are allowed to hold school offices, but not to vote on school matters. In California women are eligible to all educational offices except those from which the State constitution excludes them, and in Wisconsin they are eligible to any office connected with the schools but that of State superintendent. In Maine, Connecticut, and Tennessee women can hold "certain" school offices.

In Massachusetts women are limited to a vote for school committee. In Michigan, Vermont, and in New York until recently, only tax-paying women could vote. In Oregon only widows having taxable property and children to educate. In Indiana only women not married, nor minors, who pay taxes, and are listed as guardians, parents, or heads of families. Women have full suffrage in one Territory, Wyoming. There they have exercised it on the same terms as men since 1869, and they habitually vote in somewhat larger proportion to their numbers than do men. Women have a right to vote "by petition" on the granting of liquor licenses in Arkansas and Mississippi. In Kansas women have been given municipal suffrage in all cities of first, second, and third class, which last includes incorporated towns and villages containing only 500 inhabitants.

Something like nineteen years ago England gave municipal suffrage to unmarried women on the same terms as men. It accomplished such admirable results, especially in the management of public schools and the care of the poor, that Parliament granted the same right to the women of Scotland. In 1880, the women of the Isle of Man who owned real estate equal in value to $20 a year were given the parliamentary franchise. When they voted for the first time in 1881 the local press announced that "the new political element acted in the most admirable manner." In Canada five provinces give a restricted municipal suffrage to women, and the concurrent testimony of all parties and of the minister of finance, Hon. George Foster, is that the result is altogether in the interest of temperance and high morality.

It is evident, therefore, to all who watch the movements of the times that the experiment of full woman suffrage will be made at no very remote day, not only in America, but among all civilized peoples. Women are throbbing with the same general unrest against a government to which they have never consented as men have manifested in their long struggle for liberty against kings, emperors, popes, and czars. "The ultimate form of government for the world is republican," says Matthew Arnold, "and America easily leads the future."

Public opinion, in our country, long ago decided that "Universal suffrage is the first truth and only basis of a genuine republic," and that "no just government can be formed without the consent of the governed." Our fathers enunciated and defended these doctrines by a generation of dispute with the British crown, and at last won their case in the arbitrament of a seven-year war. They probably did not think of women at the time. They used the word "people," which includes women, and what they struggled for and won was a principle of universal application. For if the ballot is given man to protect him in "his life, liberty, and property," for the same reasons should it be given to woman, as she has the same "life, liberty, and property" to protect. And this is to-day very largely conceded, for no valid argument can be made against it.

During the last fifty years the evolution of woman has lifted her out of a legal relation to man which was that of a servant to a master or a ward to a guardian. To-day she stands by his side a disfranchised citizen. Every step of her advance from slavery to her present partial freedom has been hotly contested by men, and sometimes by women, who in selfish luxury and unthinking ignorance have been subsidized by demagogues and used as flails to beat back their struggling sisters from the attainment of their aims. The bitter conflict still goes on. There is no lack of vulgar innuendo or ignominious political dodge among the weapons of woman's opponents. Every rag of prejudice and every threadbare scrap of objection are brought into requisition when women demand their rights, although they have been shriveled a hundred times in the scorching fires of the last forty years' debate.

Also the words of Elizabeth Cady Stanton, addressed to the Judiciary Committee of the United States Senate:

And yet here we stand, after half a century of persistent effort, still wholly unrepresented in the Government, while having done all in our power, alike in peace and war, to maintain the grand institutions bequeathed us by the fathers.

Have you ever thought, gentlemen, that the vast possessions within our national boundaries, with all their future wealth and grandeur, belong to women as well as to men? We are the natural heirs to one-half this magnificent estate. What would you think of the sons of a family who should seize the whole of a private estate and dole out to the sisters a pittance in charity when asked to restore their legal share of the inheritance? And what should we think of the women who in such circumstances failed to assert their rights and assume their duties to guard and wisely use the wealth their fathers had accumulated for them as well as their brothers?

Those who enjoy the blessings of wealth should share in its responsibilities. Those who ask for rights under the Government should be prepared to assume its duties.

We do not question man's ability to manage our affairs, but we need the development of learning to manage our own. There is nothing more enervating than continual dependence.

We are here to-day, honorable gentlemen, to ask you to take the necessary steps for the speedy enfranchisement of woman for the three following reasons:

1. For the benefit that self-government will be to herself.
2. For the immense advantage it will be to the family to have liberally educated wives and mothers at the fireside.
3. For the benefit of the State in having woman's interest in the public good legally recognized.

In considering the first proposition we must view woman as a woman, to be educated for the whole round of human duties. In prescribing her rights we must not limit her sphere as wife, mother, housekeeper, teacher, or seamstress, as she may never fill one of these positions or may fill all. In deciding her rights, consider her simply as a citizen of the United States. The capacities or attractions of each individual must settle the question of education and sphere, of rights and duties. In conferring the right of suffrage on men we do not ask whether they are husbands, fathers, or blacksmiths.

In addressing those who already enjoy the right of suffrage one would naturally suppose that it would not be necessary to enlarge on the advantages of having a voice in deciding the laws and the rulers under which one lives.

And neither would it if each member of this committee understood that woman's wants and needs are similar to his own; that the cardinal virtues belong to her as well as to him; that personal dignity, the power of self-protection, are as important for her as for him; that woman loves justice, equality, liberty, and wishes the right to give her consent to the Government under which she lives as well as man does. Matthew Arnold says: "The first desire of every cultured mind is to take part in the great work of government."

The virtue of patriotism would be far greater among men, their devotion to the public good more earnest, if the influences of home life were not continually drawing them into a narrow selfishness.

Women naturally take no interest in questions where their opinions have no weight, in a sphere of action from which they are excluded. They are not supposed to know what is necessary for the public good, hence how could they influence their husbands to make that their first duty when in public life?

But when women are enfranchised their interest in the State will deepen. They will see that the good of their own children depends as much on the conditions of the outside world as on the environments of their own homes. Just as the diseases generated in the filthy lanes and narrow courts of our great cities are wafted to our palace homes, declaiming the ranks of the young and beautiful, so if the moral atmosphere of society is corrupt the pure and innocent are the readiest victims. Our fragrant hedges and high stone walls are no protection against the insidious poison of vices permitted by laws in which woman has no voice. When the interest mothers feel for the welfare of their sons finds expression in the laws, the morals of the street will be elevated and a purer code of virtue govern our homes.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent in this connection, if it has not heretofore been granted, that all gentlemen who desire may print remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leaves of absence were granted as follows:

To Mr. HEMPHILL, for the remainder of the week, on account of important business.

To Mr. CARUTH, indefinitely.

To Mr. NORTON, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. QUACKENBUSH, for one week, on account of important business.

ADMISSION OF WYOMING.

Mr. BAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri desire to take the floor now?

Mr. MANSUR. Under ordinary circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I would not take the floor at this time; but, sir, the character of the debate and the character of the attendance at this hour are so wonderful that I desire to emphasize the point by exercising the highest character of right that belongs to a Representative in addressing myself to the country, for surely I am not addressing myself to Congress. When I recognize by an actual count there are not exceeding twelve members present, it reminds me of the fact that we are attempting, as it were, to bring a State into this Union by a Caesarean operation rather than by those methods of careful preparation and all the ceremonies that surround a proper accouchement of an honored member of an honored family.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to emphasize that so much as to say that on this occasion we emphasize the fact that there are times when we must often ignore the evidence of our own senses, and in this I do not want to act upon the suggestion I am now throwing out by any manner of means; but simply addressing the country, I would say that certainly Hon. THOMAS B. REED, the Speaker of this House, can evidently see that there is no quorum here now by the exercise of his own senses, and that we are not doing business very rapidly in the way of educating the members of this House who are to vote on this question to-morrow.

I was talking to a gentleman who is now present, a member of Congress recently, and who knows little of what the bill proposes. He has not considered it himself; he admits, most frankly, that he does not know anything about it; but yet to-morrow the members of this House will act upon this measure, and without that deliberation and investigation they at least might obtain by hearing the discussion; but each will vote as the committee has, so to speak, instructed him. When we consider further that there are only certain amendments adopted and that the position assumed at least by the minority of the committee is not one of open hostility against the admission of Wyoming—

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. Let me suggest to the gentleman before he leaves the point he was making that there are four times as many on this side as on the other. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANSUR. No, sir; I see one, two, three—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will confine himself to the question under consideration.

Mr. MANSUR. I desire to state here, then, so that it may go on record for the benefit of those who may possibly glance over the RECORD in the morning, what I understand to be the position of the minority. We state in this report that we are not absolutely fighting against the admission of Wyoming. But we have said, as we believe, that in the organic act by which Wyoming was made a Territory the right to vote was confined alone to the male people of that Territory; that in violation of that, with out even authority of a Territorial act of the Legislature calling the people to assemble in their respective voting places, but under a mere proclamation of the governor, they met at a certain time, and there were some 8,000 people represented, passed upon a constitution that had previously been submitted to the delegates who assembled under this call of the governor of the Territory.

Now, sir, the minority have even been willing, in view of what they understood to be a possibly fair sentiment in that Territory, to overlook that. But when we come to consider the question of female suffrage here it was so great an innovation on all the past, it was so wide a departure from the doctrines of our fathers who established the Constitution, that we did desire that the voice of the people should be taken under the sanction of law; and if the people voted without authority of law there might be some punishment for the offense. That should be submitted separately and apart, and being so submitted, if it were adopted by the people of that Territory, that it could be certified here; and if the constitution itself, in a separate election to which it was to be ordered, was sustained by the people, that then they could come in under a proclamation by the President.

I repeat, sir, that the worst that could occur if Democratic ideas should prevail in this would be to submit this under the forms of law and have it adopted by the people, as we have every reason to expect that in all probability it would be, and that they would come here regularly by authority of law and be entitled to their representation in this Hall next winter at the assembling of Congress. That is admission, then, that the position the minority of this committee have recommended and the suggestions submitted by them are, as it were, not even accorded a hearing.

I will give way now to those gentlemen who desire to introduce matters by unanimous consent.

COTTON-SEED OIL.

Mr. McCLAMMY. I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD two telegrams which I hold in my hand, one coming from the business agent of the Alliance of the State of North Carolina and the other from the secretary, representing a membership of 90,000. The committee have ceased taking testimony and I just ask permission to have the telegrams printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The telegrams are as follows:

RALEIGH, N. C., March 15, 1890.

Hon. C. W. McCLAMMY,

House of Representatives:

We know the Conger bill, No. 283, and the Butterworth bill, No. 679, if passed by Congress, will greatly damage if not destroy the cotton-seed-oil industry of the South, and thereby do great damage to the interest of the farmers and laborers of the South. We do most earnestly protest against its passage and recommend that it do not pass.

W. H. WORTH,
State Business Agent, North Carolina Farmers' Alliance.

RALEIGH, N. C., March 15, 1890.

Hon. C. W. McCLAMMY,

House of Representatives, Washington:

I am most decidedly opposed to bills Nos. 283 and 679, known respectively as the Conger and the Butterworth bills. I think I can safely say every cotton farmer in North Carolina is also opposed to them. If these bills become laws the entire cotton-seed industry in the South will be destroyed.

E. C. BEDDINGFIELD,
Secretary North Carolina Farmers' State Alliance.

REVIVAL OF AMERICAN SHIPPING TRADE.

Mr. CUMMINGS obtained unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the following memorial:

Resolutions passed unanimously at the fourth national convention of the American Shipping and Industrial League, Washington, D. C., February 5, 6, and 7, 1890.

The American Shipping and Industrial League, zealously pursuing its object, the promotion of the development of American labor and distribution of the products thereof by the enlargement and extension of the merchant marine of the United States, at its session in Washington City, February 5, 6, and 7, 1890, reaffirms the declaration made at its last annual meeting.

Whereas our best foreign markets naturally are those of Central and South America, the West Indies, Eastern Asia, and Australia, but from which we are now practically excluded by inadequate transportation facilities of our own; and

Whereas the distribution of American products could be better effected through the instrumentality of American merchants and their own ships, which would earn the freight that always has to be paid in cash, whether there be profit or loss on the cargo; and

Whereas the nationality of a ship in which goods are transported generally carries with it, to a great extent, the command of the market to which the goods are consigned, and also controls the exchanges by which payments are effected; and

Whereas the decay of American shipping has had and must naturally have an injurious effect upon all industries, because it forces the country to pay enormous sums in cash for foreign transportation, which sums might and should be returned to our country through our own merchants owning their own shipping; and

Whereas a merchant marine is absolutely essential to the maritime defense of the nation, since without it we will not have seamen to man the Navy in time of war; and

Whereas the rapidly developing industrial power of the South makes it certain that, with the aid of that section, the time is at hand when the United States will be able, with proper protection of the shipping interests, to defy the open and fair competition of the world in the foreign export trade: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That this convention urge upon the Congress of the United States proper measures for the revival and extension of the merchant marine and declare that among such measures we recognize as timely and effective the bill known as the "tonnage bill," which provides that every vessel, sail or steam, built and owned in the United States, and engaged in the foreign trade, plying between the ports of the United States and foreign ports or between foreign ports and other foreign ports, shall be allowed the sum of 30 cents per gross registered ton for each 1,000 miles sailed, outward and inward, and pro rata for any distance traveled less than 1,000, on any voyage or voyages. "The payments at the rate of 30 cents per ton for each 1,000 miles traveled as herein provided shall continue for the term of ten years at that rate, and thereafter for another term of nine years at a reduction of 3 cents per ton each year upon each 1,000 miles traveled, and pro rata for any less distance." And in recommending this bill for immediate passage we do it upon the ground that it will place the merchant marine engaged in the foreign trade upon an equality with that of other nations.

Resolved, That this convention further urge upon Congress the immediate provision for the defense of the coast and seaport cities of the United States, on the lakes as well as the seaboard.

Resolved, That we hail with gratification the acts of Congress providing for the rebuilding and equipment of a strong and efficient Navy, so necessary for maritime defense and for the security of our commerce and carrying trade on the high seas.

Resolved, That this convention further urges upon Congress the great importance of adequate provision for the improvement of the harbors and rivers of the whole country concurrently with the restoration and development of our ocean commerce, so that all sections and States of the Republic shall participate in and enjoy the benefits of restored and enlarged commerce with each other and the outside world through their natural water ways and harbors, developed by the fostering hand of the nation.

Resolved, That the United States mails ought to be carried between this and foreign countries in American ships, under our own flag, as soon as practicable, consistently with certainty and celerity of the service and that for such service this Government ought to pay a just compensation, regardless of the price at which other nations are willing to provide similar service.

Resolved, That the vast present and prospective manufacturing and commercial interests of this country entitle them to a foreign mail service the promptness, celerity, and certainty of which shall be insured, in peace and in war, by national patriotism, national pride, and national ambition to extend our influence, our commerce, and our markets throughout the world.

Resolved, That such service can only be relied upon, in peace and war, when performed by American hands, warmed by American hearts, under the American flag.

Resolved, That this convention heartily indorses the naval reserve bill, providing for the enrollment of a naval militia, etc., and recommends to Congress the immediate passage of said bill.

[SEAL.]

CHAS. S. HILL,

Secretary and Commissioner.

JOSEPH WHEELER, President.

On motion, it was unanimously resolved and directed that a copy of the above should be presented to the President and Vice-President of the United States, to each member of the Cabinet, to both Houses of Congress, and also to the governor and Legislature of each State of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The time has arrived under the special order when it becomes necessary to declare that the House is in recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker at 11 o'clock a. m. (Thursday, March 27, 1890).

REMONSTRANCES AGAINST EXPENDITURES FOR WAR LIKE PURPOSES.

Mr. MARTIN, of Indiana, obtained unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the following memorials; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

Remonstrances of Back Creek, Fairmount, Deer Creek, and Marion Monthly Meetings of Friends, of Grant County, Indiana, against proposed large expenditures of public money for naval, coast defense, and other warlike measures.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:
We, your petitioners, of Deer Creek Monthly Meeting of Friends, Grant County, State of Indiana, numbering 225 adult persons, respectfully, but earnestly, entreat your honorable bodies to reject the recommendations of the Senate Naval Committee, and other measures which propose a large expenditure for the Navy and so-called coast defenses, and other warlike preparations, all of which we believe are a menace to the peace and security of the nation.

ARTHUR W. JAY,
MIRA SMALL,
Clerks.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:
We, your petitioners, of Back Creek Monthly Meeting of Friends, Grant County, State of Indiana, numbering 135 adult persons, respectfully, but earnestly, entreat your honorable bodies to reject the recommendations of the Senate Naval Committee, and other measures which propose a large expenditure for the Navy and so-called coast defenses, and other warlike preparations, all of which we believe are a menace to the peace and security of the nation.

SAMUEL C. WILSON,
A. J. ROOK,
Clerks.
N. HILL, Correspondent.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:
We, your petitioners, of Fairmount Monthly Meeting of Friends, Grant County, State of Indiana, numbering 424 adult persons, respectfully, but earnestly, entreat your honorable bodies to reject the recommendations of the Senate Naval Committee, and other measures which propose a large expenditure for the Navy and so-called coast defenses, and other warlike preparations, all of which we believe are a menace to the peace and security of the nation.

ENOS HARVEY, Clerk.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:
We, your petitioners, of Marion Monthly Meeting of Friends, Grant County, State of Indiana, numbering 437 adult persons, respectfully, but earnestly, entreat your honorable bodies to reject the recommendations of the Senate Naval Committee, and other measures which propose a large expenditure for the Navy and so-called coast defenses, and other warlike preparations, all of which we believe are a menace to the peace and security of the nation.

Signed by direction and on behalf of the aforesaid meeting, held at Marion, Grant County, Indiana, third month, 5th, 1890.

SARAH ANN SMALL, Clerk.
ISAAC ELLIOTT, Clerk for the Day.
JOEL OVERMAN, Corresponding Secretary.

ADMISSION OF WYOMING.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, the remaining two hours of this debate, I believe, are to be equally divided.

Mr. SPRINGER. How is that?

Mr. BAKER. The remaining two hours are to be divided, I believe, between the friends and the opponents of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is mistaken. The side represented by the gentleman from New York has occupied three hours and thirty-one minutes.

Mr. BAKER. What portion of the time—

The SPEAKER. The other side has occupied two hours and eighteen minutes.

Mr. BAKER. Then the other side can have the floor. How much time will remain to this side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine that. It will require something in the nature of a mathematical calculation to determine. [Laughter.] The Chair will recognize some gentleman in opposition to the bill.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, it is with some reluctance that I make any objection to the passage of this bill to admit Wyoming into the Union. The cause of the State is so earnestly championed by the Delegate who has represented its interests so faithfully and so ably in this House since the day I entered it that I sympathize with him in the enthusiasm he has manifested in favor of the immediate creation of this Territory into a State of the Union. I may say personally that it would gratify me to congratulate him hereafter as the Senator from the new State of Wyoming. But, Mr. Speaker, there are to my mind some objections to the admission of this Territory at this time, and I must urge them here and vote my convictions against the passage of the bill.

The manner in which the proceedings have been conducted up to this instant to make this new State have been rather rapid, rather rushing; too inconsiderate, it seems to me, to be applied to the creation of a new State in this Union.

The movement was set on foot by the county commissioners of the Territory, at whose instance does not appear. The county commissioners of my State are elected to manage the financial affairs of the county to some extent; to levy certain taxes; to determine the amount to be expended generally in the county; to build bridges; to construct certain public buildings; control the county road system, and matters of that kind. It would not be regarded as absurd and ridiculous were they to petition the governor of the State to call a convention to adopt amendments to the constitution; but if they were to attempt to invest the governor and other officers of the State with powers for that purpose, such as these boards requested them to exercise, wholly without the authority of law, their course would be regarded as extremely presumptuous.

These commissioners asked the governor of the State with two or three other officials to proceed to district the State and apportion the number of delegates to the several districts, and do such other acts as may be necessary to call together delegates for the purpose of passing upon the fundamental law that should rest upon the people of that Territory for an interminable period, and might be fixed in such a way that it would be next to impossible to amend it in its objectionable features. Reading from the report (part second, the views of the minority) will show how rapidly this whole business was rushed in that Territory. The proclamation for this convention was issued on the 3d day of June, 1889, the election was held on the second Monday of July, and the convention assembled at Cheyenne, the capital of the Territory, on the first Monday in September, and proceeded to formulate a constitution. The convention adjourned on the 31st day of September, and the election for the ratification of the constitution was held on the 5th day of November thereafter. Only thirty-five days intervened between the time when the convention adjourned and the holding of the election on the constitution.

To us living in the older States where communication is rapid, where it is easy for the people to get together, this may not seem like very rushing work; but if gentlemen will look at the map of the Territory of Wyoming and consider for a moment the conditions of that Territory, they will find that it is larger than several States of the Union, as is mentioned in the report. There is but one line of railway running through that Territory, and that line of railroad is within 50 or 60 miles of the southern border of the Territory, and there is one other line of railway merely entering the Territory. The notice of any one of these transactions of which I read but a moment ago could not have been properly given in five weeks' time. There were many citizens of the Territory who knew nothing about them, when they should have been fully informed.

Mr. Speaker, I venture to say that there are tracts of territory in Wyoming as large as the State of Ohio in which no election was held at any time upon the Territorial question or upon this constitution. I venture to say that there are tracts of country there as large as the State of Connecticut, as large as the State of New Jersey, in which a hundred families do not reside.

Mr. CAREY. Will the gentleman allow me a single suggestion?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I have no objection.

Mr. CAREY. I know the gentleman would not willingly make a misstatement—

Mr. OUTHWAITE. No, sir.

Mr. CAREY. The gentleman has said that there is one railroad in our Territory and another entering it. I wish to say that we have one railroad running entirely through the Territory from east to west; another coming from the east runs nearly to the center of the Territory; and there is another line running north and south. We have also the Burlington and Quincy road running 30 or 40 miles in the northwest corner.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I am glad to be corrected. I said that looking at the map—and I have taken a very recent one.

Mr. CAREY. We grow so rapidly out there that the maps do not keep up with us.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The maps keep up as rapidly as the population grows; and I have just said I have no doubt there are portions of that Territory as large as several of the minor States of this Union in which a hundred families do not reside.

Mr. Speaker, this rapidity of movement, this method of election, is illustrated in the remarks of the gentleman from Wyoming himself. Speaking upon the vote on the ratification of the constitution, he says:

There were cast 8,195 votes, 1,923 votes being against the constitution only. There was not an election throughout the Territory for any other purpose; everybody appeared for the constitution.

In the vote cast nearly 20 per cent. were against the constitution. What becomes of the assertion "Everybody appeared for the constitution."

That is a mere opinion of the gentleman. Then reading again from page 15 I find the gentleman using this language:

The vote in 1888 was 18,210. The population can not be properly based on the vote. But there is but little of politics in Wyoming.

The population, as I have shown by the maps exhibited, is scattered over 100,000 square miles of territory; and taking the best estimate of the population given by the gentleman himself there is in that Territory just one person to a square mile. Within thirty days after notice each one of these elections takes place among a people scattered over 100,000 square miles of territory. Under such circumstances, Mr. Speaker, it was utterly impossible that there could have been held a fair, just, and proper election upon the ratification of this constitution. It contains provisions of a peculiar character. It contains a provision which in its present form would disfranchise every person coming into Wyoming hereafter, except those who can read the English language.

This provision should certainly be modified or corrected so that our German-speaking citizens, our Scandinavian citizens, our citizens of other non-English-speaking nationalities—Dutch, French, Austrian, Russian—who may wish to go into that Territory and become citizens may not be disfranchised. This is not a matter of construction. The language of the provision, taken with the fact that this is generally an English-speaking people, would preclude any persons from being citizens unless they could read the constitution of the State in English.

Then there is this provision as to woman suffrage. As was shown yesterday, female suffrage exists in that Territory in contravention of the law which constituted the Territory. Yet female suffrage was permitted to be an element in constituting this constitution, which is to disfranchise the male citizens of other parts of the Union, which is to disfranchise all who do not read the English language.

Section 9, Article VI, of that instrument is as follows:

No person shall have the right to vote who shall not be able to read the constitution of this State. The provisions of this section shall not apply to any person prevented by physical disability from complying with its requirements.

Here is an invitation to immigration! Plainly this new-born State says to all men who can not read, "Stay out of my borders." In addition to those of foreign birth, the native of this land who, surrounded by poverty in childhood, obtained no education is disfranchised the day he settles here. The veteran of the Union armies, who seeks a home upon the public domain in Wyoming, if he can not read, must yield up one of the priceless rights of citizenship. Four times as many acres as there are in the farms of Ohio, of public lands subject to entry under our homestead laws, are thus withdrawn from that privilege to these men and all others similarly situated.

Illiteracy is to be punished. The negroes of the South, unfortunate in this respect, are virtually forbidden to come to Wyoming in search of homes. With this discouragement to immigration, this practical exclusion of the men who constitute a large portion of the human labor, the predictions of the gentleman from Wyoming of a rapid increase in the population resulting from statehood are not likely to be realized. An educational qualification such as this, if to become effective some years hence, might not be so objectionable. Let this House send this constitution back to the people of that Territory with such instructions as may awaken them to a sense of the unwisdom and undesirable features of its provisions upon suffrage and eligibility to office, and let the whole of the people have an opportunity to consider and vote upon them. Delay long enough for this purpose can do no harm and may do very much good.

Mr. Speaker, we have been, by the action of the Committee on Rules, precluded from offering amendments to this bill. There are three amendments, however, of the minority of the committee that we are permitted to vote upon. One of these provides for referring this constitution back to the people and permitting them to vote upon these vital questions. What objection can there be to that? Do gentlemen fear that if this question be referred back to the people and they be permitted to vote on it these provisions will be stricken out? Then they ought to be stricken out.

Mr. CAREY. Will the gentlemen permit me another question?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. If it is not to be taken out of my time.

Mr. CAREY. What do you mean by "the people" of the Territory—the voters in the Territory to-day or only the men?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. If I could determine the matter myself, I should refer the question only to the male citizens. But as the provision is in the laws of your Territorial government—

Mr. CAREY. You would take the right away from those people to say whether they want to continue in the exercise of suffrage.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I would permit those who generally throughout the United States are recognized as citizens entitled to vote—I would permit them only to determine this question. But that is not possible. All that I propose now is, following the amendment offered by the minority of the committee, to submit the whole question to the whole people—not to one-third of them, not to one-fourth of them, but to give all of them a fair opportunity to vote upon the question. Let the fact of this election be published abroad. Let the counties that do not lie on the railroads, that lie out in the rural districts—let those counties have an opportunity to pass on these questions.

But I was asking what objection can there be to the proceeding proposed by the minority of the committee? Has any objection been offered? None has been offered in my hearing during this debate, except that the resubmission of this question might involve some trouble and inconvenience to the people of that Territory. Sir, the fundamental rights of the people of the Territory are worth tenfold the amount of trouble and inconvenience to which they would be put in order to pass upon these questions in a proper manner.

Do you object because you fear some political mischance? The chairman of this committee [Mr. BAKER] in his opening remarks alluded to the conduct of what is now the minority side of this House in the preceding Congress with regard to the bill which admitted the two Dakotas, Montana, and Washington. I could heartily congratulate that gentleman if he and his colleagues had manifested as much fairness as many of the Democrats did on that occasion, if he had presented to us at this time a bill embracing four Territories, giving us, so far as the political aspect is concerned, a chance for one to three. You have brought in here a bill to admit the Territory which has the smallest population of the four seeking admission; and you have refused to report up to this time a bill for the admission of the Territory of New Mexico, which has three times the population of the Territory of Wyoming, which has greater wealth, which has more railroads and everything else which indicates material prosperity in greater abundance than Wyoming.

You propose to admit to a seat in this House and to seats upon the floor of the Senate a Representative and two Senators representing a smaller number of people than live in the county in which I have the honor to reside, less than half as many people as there are in the district I represent. The city of Columbus—my home—has a larger tax duplicate, more banking capital, greater manufactories, larger commerce, more valuable public buildings, more school facilities, and contains more school-children, and more men and women than this Territory which you now propose to invest with statehood; yet it is but a very small portion of the great State of Ohio, whose two Senators are hereafter to be counterbalanced by the two Senators from Wyoming.

I should think that gentlemen on the other side of the House would pause and consider, even in their haste to win unfairly political advantages, whether they are willing to admit a Territory into the Union of States and give it this great power in Congress with so few people as it has, in the face of the lesson of Nevada, which to-day, after over a quarter of a century of statehood, has a smaller number of votes, yes, about one-third as many votes as the number of voters in the district electing each of them to Congress.

Mr. CAREY. How does the case of Nevada compare with that of Florida, which was given 13,000,000 acres of land, and which, on account of its position on the seacoast has had abundant opportunities of access?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. If there is objection to that which was done in the case of Florida forty-five years ago, it ought to be a lamp to light the feet of this House at this time, not an encouragement to us to perpetrate another wrong of like character. But I do not admit that there was any such mistake in that case. Twenty-five years after admission Florida had nearly 200,000 people.

The gentleman has introduced tables here to show that certain States in days gone by, after their admission, did not cast many votes. Yet at the time they were admitted they had about the requisite number to entitle them to a member of this House. The ordinance which permitted the formation of five States from the territory northwest of the Ohio River proposed over a century ago the rule that the number of people to constitute any of those States should be 60,000.

Mr. CAREY. But two of them were admitted with 33,000.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I do not think the gentleman's figures are exact. They were, however, admitted with a smaller number than 60,000. The basis of representation also was much smaller at that time than it is now. A national census will soon be taken. A census of this Territory can be taken before the meeting of this Congress at the next session; and this census would show whether Wyoming has half as many people as will be required in the next apportionment for a Representative in Congress. If it comes here with one-half as many people and if its constitution is so amended as to be, in my estimation, truly and purely republican in form, I will vote for its admission. But I regard that feature which provides for disfranchising all citizens unless they can read the Constitution in the English language as utterly unrepugnant, undemocratic, un-American, and unworthy the indorsement of this House.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW].

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Speaker, over twenty years ago I assisted in creating the Territory of Wyoming; also in assigning to it a Pennsylvania name. I should now be perfectly willing to change that Territory into a State, to admit it among our sisterhood of States as an honored member, if, in my judgment, the conditions proper to such transition now existed.

We are told by this committee that this Territory contains 62,000,000 acres of land, of which from four to five millions are arable without resort to artificial means of irrigation; and according to the estimates which are made by the geologist of the Territory the amount of land that can be made arable by resorting to artificial irrigation is 12,000,000 acres. Here, then, is a Territory of 62,000,000 acres, of which sixteen or seventeen million acres only are capable of being made suitable for the purposes of agriculture, and consequently of supporting a dense population. And these are the estimates that we are to accept with some considerable degree of allowance, because they are made merely upon conjecture; they are vague or general estimates, which may not be realized when they come to be tested in the future by time and trial.

Now, as to the mineral resources of that Territory, which are painted in such grand colors, I find in the end we are told that the whole of the mineral production of that Territory is coal, of which the insignificant amount at present is 2,000,000 tons per year. Sir, when this Territory shall have yielded mineral products to any considerable extent and of course have acquired population along with production, it will be time, and not until then, to present to Congress this question of admission.

But, sir, what I propose is to say a few words in behalf of the one-fourth of the voters of that Territory who voted against this application to Congress at a voluntary election, when there was no legal obligation upon the election officers or upon anybody else to participate in the proceedings or to conform to, law or fairness in what was done. These persons—a very considerable proportion, one-fourth of the whole number reported as voting—said "No."

Now take this question of irrigation. We are told in this committee report that about two million and a half of acres are now artificially provided with water; but there is no supply from what are called supply basins, no extensive or great works by which large quantities of land can be made fertile. It is only by tapping the streams and some small sources, at comparatively light expense, that this proportionately small quantity of land has been assisted into a condition of fertility. We have established already by act of Congress a scheme or plan of assisting our new Territories that have waste and arid lands to obtain large and permanent supplies of water for the purposes of irrigation.

This policy was established at the last session of Congress; and we have a bureau organized with scientific experts for the examination of our Western and Southwestern region, where this question of irrigation is so important and where some system of irrigation is so indispensable to the future prosperity of the country. If matters are allowed to take their natural course, this Government will appropriate money to that object; for we know that in those Territories there is not the ability among the inhabitants to do the work. Those Territories are yet small in population, limited in resources, and it requires the powerful arm of the Government to be stretched out to accomplish any large and permanent results for the future.

The Government has undertaken that, and in this very Territory of Wyoming, where no supply basins have been erected and where at several points a large outlay would be necessary, the Government will come to the assistance of the people of the Territory and will give to them by generous appropriations of money that which is of tenfold more importance and value to them than any possible political organization in the form of a new and weak State government could be. And I take it, Mr. Speaker, that the intelligent, sagacious inhabitants of that Territory, as well as of two or three others that might be named, have already taken into account this important and vital question to their own prosperity and that they believe it wise policy to defer State organizations and allow the General Government, while it controls the lands and holds political jurisdiction in those sections, to carry out this system of beneficent Government patronage and assistance. They were wise in voting against a premature entrance into the Union, establishing a State jurisdiction over their lands, ousting the United States from all local concern in their affairs except as an owner of undisposed-of lands.

Now, for one I am perfectly willing to give to this Territory of Wyoming, and to the Territories of Arizona and of New Mexico, partially perhaps to Idaho also, reasonable contributions of the public moneys while they remain in the Territorial condition, in order to enable them to establish and maintain a condition of things indispensable to their future prosperity and welfare. But if they slip out from under our hand and assume positions in the Union as sovereign States they will take along with them into that changed condition necessarily all of the responsibilities for their own future. Then what will become of this great work of irrigation? What will happen in regard to it? Why, sir, the enterprises necessary to supply water will fall into the hands of corporations in every one of the new States where irrigation is required. This will be the practical result, for necessarily to the large outlays for the great basins and works, corporate capital, and corporate capital alone, will be adequate.

Such works can only be accomplished through the agency of associated capital, and the inhabitants of the Territories, then new States, will be subject to corporate control over this vital question of their water supply. I would have the Government of the United States, as far as reasonable and proper, undertake the work while these Territories remain under our control, in a Territorial condition, and establish such works, holding the necessary lands adjoining, as was provided in the House bill of last session, until the works are perfected, then pass the title to individual owners upon an increased price, which will reimburse a large part of the outlay; and ultimately I would turn the works over to the States when organized and allow them to hold the title in trust for the benefit of the people. So that in future times they will not be ground down by corporate greed, and the waters of heaven will not be doled out to them under corporate charters, but be obtainable under beneficent and wise arrangements adopted in the interests of all the people.

One point further—I have not time to speak at length on this question—and I will close. I can well understand how this movement for a new State was gotten up. The governor of the Territory and the chief-justice of the Territory obtained petitions, not from the people, but from certain little office-holders of the Territory, doubtless invited and inspired by them; and then, without law and in contempt of the United States, those officials divided the State into districts, and the governor's proclamation to the people directed them what they should do. Thus they get up a bogus convention in contempt of law, and upon a meager vote of perhaps 5,000 male inhabitants of that Territory the constitution was adopted and sent here for our acceptance.

What is the consideration for this? Seats in the Senate and in this House; a State governorship, State judgeships and other State offices to be portioned around as far as they will go, to be imposed upon the people of the Territory for support; and the bribe held out to the political majority in Congress was to be two Senators and a Representative on this floor from the new State. That is the bribe to pass this bill through Congress. That is the bribe which the local office-seeking interest in the Territory hold out to the political majority in Congress. The temptation is strong, I admit it; but is it too strong to be resisted? Why, sir, there is no necessity at this time, nor will there be within some years, for adding to the political majority in the Senate of the United States. I would ask gentlemen, in conclusion, would it not be well to allow a few of the Territories in political accord with them to remain in the Territorial condition for a few years longer, and bring them in hereafter when they will need votes in the other House? That would be sensible. That would be political wisdom. At present there is no political necessity for this measure. It remains to be seen whether that unwise appeal made to the majority in this House is to be listened to and prevail in this body. [Applause.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McADOO].

Mr. McADOO. Mr. Speaker, the principle of home rule is a most sacred one, and one which it would ill become me to question here or elsewhere. But home rule presumes that there are a sufficient number of rulers. A State is not constituted by acres, by minerals, by trees, by steers, or horses, or donkeys; a State is constituted of men, and in the case of Wyoming, presumably, of women; and there should be a sufficient population within the borders of the Territory before it can be admitted or shall be admitted as a State into the Union. Again, Mr. Speaker, while the principle of home rule is a sacred one and an important one, the right of admission into the Union is also a sacred one. Now, the gentlemen on the other side with great alacrity apply this principle of home rule to the sparse population of Wyoming, while they deny it arrogantly to the larger population of New Mexico.

We are asked by gentlemen on the other side to hasten by our votes the granting of home rule to the womanhood of Wyoming while persistently denying it to the manhood of Arizona. We are told by gentlemen on the other side that we must not, in the light of the principles of home rule, question what they have put into the constitution of Wyoming. On the other hand, gentlemen on the other side state that we shall question that which they put into the constitution of another State. I am asked by my vote to accept the principle of woman suffrage in Wyoming and I am asked to reject the polygamous feature in suffrage in Utah. If you are going to enforce the principle of home rule do it justly, applying it even-handedly to all the Territories which ask to become States of the Union.

I am in favor of the most liberal laws to enable every Territory in the Union to become a State. I am in favor of the cardinal principle of home rule, but I can not under the cry of home rule close my eyes to the injustice of admitting the present Territory of Wyoming while you exclude other Territories from admission. Now, I believe that you have the same right to exclude Wyoming because of its constitution that you have to exclude the constitution of Utah. This constitution of Wyoming was formulated by thirty-nine men, possibly assembled in a back room, and ratified by a little over 6,000 people, men and women. If not the worst constitution which has ever been adopted, it is to my mind certainly abreast of the worst. There is in this constitution almost everything to which I am opposed as sound in politics, in morals, or in economics. You usher this State into the Union by wholesale spoliation of the public domain. A distinguished gentleman on the other side said that the same thing was done in Florida. I do not care if it was done in every State in the Union; and as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] so well replied, if they have wasted the public lands which belonged, not to the people of Wyoming or of Florida, but to the whole people of the United States, in former times, the greater reason exists why we should not do it in this case.

These grants of land of the people of the United States are for penitentiaries, for educational buildings, for all sorts of institutions, for fish hatcheries; and, as the gentleman from Alabama, in reply to my interrogatory yesterday, said, there is no restriction as to who may purchase these thousands and thousands of acres. They may be all bought by one syndicate; they may be all bought by one man; they may be all bought, as the gentleman suggested, by foreigners. Yes, and you have placed in this constitution a provision in order to enable foreigners to buy these lands with which you are to purchase your penitentiaries and with which you are to experiment in your fish hatcheries.

Here is one provision in the constitution with reference to the purchase of land that I will call the attention of my friend from Alabama to. They have incorporated in the organic law of this proposed State that foreigners shall hold land, instead of conforming to the act we have passed in the Forty-ninth Congress that they shall not hold land. "No distinction," say these thirty-nine gentlemen in the back room in formulating the constitution which was indorsed by a little over 6,000 votes of the people of Wyoming, and which the gentleman from Wyoming says they went through a blinding snow-storm to deposit—"No distinction shall ever be made by law between resident aliens and citizens as to the possession, taxation, and enjoyment and descent of property."

Let me say to my friend from Wyoming that if this constitution had been made by three hundred delegates chosen at an open, fair election in an open convention it never would have had that provision in it, and if it had been voted upon at an election of 200,000 people instead of 6,000 it would have been rejected three to one in any American State or community.

Now, then, gentlemen, you take from the fast-receding public domain, which should be the safety-valve of republican institutions in America, thousands and thousands of acres of land and give it to this feeble and sparse community to make it a State, and you put in the constitution of that new State that foreign syndicates and the landlords of Europe, who are finding that the laws of that country in reference to land are becoming obnoxious to the growing democracy there, and who are hastening hither to get hold of the fertile acres of America, that they and their odious system shall find lodgment here. You have placed in the constitution and laws of the new State in distinct and radical terms a new law which would never be indorsed by the people of the United States. You have invited the ostracised, odious, and exiled landlords, forced by the indignant population in Europe to seek other lands for investment, to come here; you have advertised in that constitution of Wyoming that here is the Mecca to which these land-hungry, selfish robber barons may hasten their steps and invest in lands. They can buy from the State of Wyoming millions of acres of these lands to be held by one vast syndicate. The next step in such a constitution should have been a provision reviving the feudal system.

Mr. MORGAN. May they not have had something to do with putting it in there?

Mr. MCADOO. My friend suggests, may they not have had something to do with putting that provision in the constitution? These people are in every part of our land, and they are nowhere more alert and more anxious to acquire property than in the new Territories about to become States. We have seen—

Mr. CAREY. What is the law in your own State?

Mr. MCADOO. The constitution of New Jersey has no such prohibitive provision as this and there are no public lands in the State of New Jersey.

Now, I state that this constitution contains to my mind almost every vicious principle in government, and the only good clause I find in it is the one that allows it to be amended. To my mind the only and proper way to amend it would be to obliterate and begin it over again. [Laughter and applause.]

These thirty-nine men in the back room formed a constitution which is ratified by 6,000 votes, by which we are to grant millions of acres, and the American people are to have their rights abridged in that land which the blood and the brains and the patriotism of the whole American people, and not the people of Wyoming, acquired.

Now, on the question of woman suffrage, reference has been made to the State of New Jersey. It was said on this floor that that was the only State in the Union which ever had woman suffrage. Well, they did not have it long, and they did not get it regularly, any more than they did in Wyoming in the enabling act which created that Territory; but at any rate so far as the State of New Jersey is concerned this was away back almost in the colonial period. There never was, I am informed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNES], who has made a very exhaustive search of that question, a decision of the court, either State or Federal, to uphold the construction given and under which women voted. They voted in New Jersey by a sort of unanimous consent of a small population.

It never arrested public attention in that State; and there has never been a whisper of reviving it from the day the new constitution of 1844 was formed until the present time; and there never will be, in my opinion.

The question of woman suffrage is so vast a one that I could not hope to discuss it in the limited period now allowed me. The literature of that subject is very great. The discussion has been conducted with signal ability on both sides. It goes without saying that every man who respects himself respects woman. The noblest, the gentlest, the most chivalrous of men have idealized woman in all ages. Now, a small faction of the sex—an insignificant faction (do not mistake the noise about this question)—ask that in this day we shall cease to idealize woman, shall no longer consider her as the fairest and best, if the fairest portion of humanity; that, in the language of the old ranters on the stage, we shall "have at it" in a competitive combat to the death. "Go to! Have at thee, villain!" [Laughter.] It is proposed that we shall no longer consider woman as fair and pure and gentle, but shall consider her as robust and manly, and at times, in political contests, probably vulgar.

No proposition was ever made in the United States which, in my opinion, would do more to destroy our institutions than the enforcement or allowance of female suffrage. The state very properly keeps away from religious questions. The state has no right to infringe the domain of religion. The Acts of the Apostles, if made into acts of Congress, would lose all their force and efficacy. [Laughter.] But the most skeptical of rulers and of men have found out that religion is a potent factor in controlling the human mind, so far as government is concerned—I care not what religion it is. He would be a daring man who would undertake to govern and a brave man who would venture to live in a faithless state. Now, it is probably a lamentable fact, but in our day it is true that women are the mainstay of religion—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield the gentleman two minutes longer.

Mr. MCADOO. Go to any of your churches in the United States or England, or more particularly in France, on a Sunday morning; look around you and you will realize that women are the mainstay of the church, the leaven of faith in a materialistic age, the very pillars of active religious life. Force them into the political arena, in contact with all the baser phases of humanity, the gross selfishness and duplicity of intense political contests, and you have taken the main prop from faith in every country where it prevails.

Why, sir, one wing of this army have attacked the Christian religion, because they say that St. Paul is the greatest enemy that woman has. Well, speaking simply as a man of the world, St. Paul was one of the greatest men that ever lived, a man of giant intellect and most noble and godlike character. Throughout the ages he looms up like a great towering mountain crowned with beacon fires to light the dullness of night. He did not declare any new law with reference to woman; he did not give any dogmatic opinion of his. St. Paul simply declared what the law of God and nature was with reference to sex. He saw written, as it were in letters of fire, the truth as to the true sphere of woman.

Woman does not belong to a class or a clique; she represents a sex with elemental and mental characteristics entirely different from those of men. Her sphere under our advanced civilization is enlarging. With advanced education, with the new needs of society, her sphere of usefulness will everywhere extend. The law with reference to her in this and other lands has very properly made great advancement. In my own and other States the statutory law has enlarged her privileges to the very verge of destroying the unity of the family relation. No one will be readier than I to advance her rights and privileges and to aid her in her struggles under the changed conditions of life that mark our age. New avenues of employment and usefulness are opening up to her, and in them she is entitled to find consideration and fair play. God and nature have designed her for nobler pursuits than those connected with ballot or bullet. Her temperament unfits her for using the one and her muscle has not been developed for the other. Great lawgivers and savage Amazons are exceptions in the sex.

It was only yesterday I learned that several of the graduates of our highest female colleges, admirable and talented young women, have taken their culture and their learning down into the very slums of New York, are spending their lives among the poor there, helping them—not talking woman suffrage or politics to them, but preaching the gospel of baths, clean morals, and good food, and in that way doing more for those poor people than woman suffrage can ever do. [Applause.] God bless woman in a mission like that!

But whenever in the great communities of America you adopt this principle of woman suffrage, whenever you take her from her pedestal as an ideal of all that is pure and good, you undermine morals and religion and corrupt our politics even beyond what they are at the present day. If there were nothing else in this constitution of Wyoming as a ground of objection save this clause allowing female suffrage I could not give it my approval. [Applause.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that the orders of this House, under the direction of the Committee on Rules, have so arranged the debate on this bill that the greater portion of it must of necessity be addressed to a beggarly account of empty benches. This discussion was continued last evening until half past 6 o'clock, when there were but a dozen members present, and this morning was resumed at 11 o'clock, when not more than twenty-five members were in attendance.

It seems to me that the question of the admission of a new State into this Union is of sufficient importance to be afforded equal consideration with that which is given in this House to a private claim or to the question of turning out a Democratic Representative and putting a Republican in the seat. For some reason or other, however, not known to me, but perhaps to the majority, it has been determined to "railroad" this bill through without proper consideration—without opportunity on the part of members to consider the various provisions of the constitution which comes here without any sanction of law, and is of no validity unless Congress shall breathe into it the breath of legislative life.

The position I have taken in regard to the admission of Territories as States is an advanced one. In the last Congress I favored, and so did the Democratic party on this floor, the admission of the four new States which came into the Union last fall. During the term of that Congress the committee of which I had the honor to be chairman reported bills looking to the admission of Wyoming, Idaho, New Mexico, and Arizona into the Union as States. The precedent in some respects of those bills has been cited here by gentlemen on the other side. I only regret that they have not followed the precedent of the last Congress, which was to treat all these Territories fairly and equally, and to furnish equal facilities for each of them to come into the Union.

The gentleman from New York stated that I was only awaiting an opportunity to present an "omnibus bill," in order that four new States might be brought into the Union at this Congress, as four were brought in at the last. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced in this Congress another "omnibus bill" providing for the admission of Wyoming, Idaho, New Mexico, and Arizona, treating all of them alike, as was done last Congress. This course seems to be objectionable to gentlemen on the other side. They assert that we must deal with each of these proposed States separately and by a distinct measure. I suppose this proceeding finds its origin in one of the passages in the Mikado; they want to "make the punishment fit the crime."

This proposed State of Wyoming presents here a constitution which enfranchises women. We are next to take up the bill to provide for the admission into the Union of the proposed State of Idaho, the constitution of which contains a provision disfranchising Mormons, both male and female. I could not quite understand at first the reason for this discrimination, but a friend of mine writing from Wyoming says that in that Territory the Mormons vote the Republican ticket, while in Idaho they are suspected of a desire to vote the Democratic ticket. Hence the gentlemen on the other side want separate bills to treat these two cases according to the different conditions existing. In Idaho they deprive the Mormons, both male and female, of the right to vote; in Wyoming, where the Mormons vote the Republican ticket, not only the Mormon himself, but his polygamous wife, is allowed to vote.

Mr. CARLISLE. And all his wives.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, all his wives and his polygamous daughters are allowed to vote.

So it appears that Mormonism is objectionable only when the person entertaining that belief is suspected of a desire to vote the Democratic ticket. I am of opinion, Mr. Speaker, that if the Mormons in Utah would give an indication of their willingness to vote the Republican ticket gentlemen on the other side would bring in a bill here, and "railroad it" through with even more rapidity than we see in the case of this bill, to make a State out of the Territory of Utah. They would then see in the beautiful valley of the Jordan more pictures of beauty and grandeur than were ever before opened to mortal view; they would discover in the Mormon temple at Salt Lake a second temple of Solomon, reared in all its grandeur by an industrious and brave people, who are entitled, it would be claimed, by every consideration of justice to be admitted into the Union, in order to send two Republican Senators to the other branch of Congress and a Republican Representative to this House.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe in dealing with each of these Territories by a separate bill according to the party exigencies of gentlemen on the other side. I believe that the question of admitting a State into the Union should be dis severed from party considerations; that all Territories applying for admission should be treated alike. Therefore I have not opposed the admission of Wyoming; but I have opposed the manner in which this Territory—the smallest in population and resources of all our Territories—is to be admitted first into the Union because it is the most certain to vote the Republican ticket and send to Congress two Republican Senators and a Republican Representative.

The Territory of New Mexico has been organized for over forty years. By a solemn treaty with Mexico when this Territory was brought into the Union we guaranteed to her people at the earliest practicable time all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States. For forty years that Territory has been knocking for admission into the Union. At the beginning of this session her Delegate [Mr. JOSEPH] introduced a bill to admit the Territory. That bill is still in the Committee on Territories; and I read in this morning's paper that it had been referred to a subcommittee with the view of taking into consideration the propriety of bringing in an act to provide for admission under the constitution already made, against the wishes of the Delegate, whose bill provides for an enabling act under a proper apportionment.

But gentlemen on the other side seem to be of opinion that the apportionment in the proposed constitution, formulated by a Republican partisan convention last summer, will insure the election of a Republican Legislature and of two Republican United States Senators, by disfranchising, practically, the Democratic voters of that Territory; and if they can invent some plan by which to bring in New Mexico as a Republican State under an iniquitous apportionment bill, disfranchising the Democratic citizens of the Territory, New Mexico will be ushered in as a full-fledged State; otherwise it must be kept in tutelage until it can bring forth "fruits meet for repentance," the assurance that it will vote the Republican ticket!

The convention which framed the proposed constitution of New Mexico was wholly partisan. Democrats did not participate in the election of the delegates. Ex-Governor Edmund G. Ross, of New Mexico, in a letter to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MANSUR], dated January 5, 1890, thus exposes the partisan character of the proposed constitution:

Primarily, that refusal was based on the exceeding unfairness of the apportionment fixed in the act of the Legislature authorizing the election of the delegates to the convention. That apportionment made it impossible for the Democrats to elect anything approaching a proportionate representation in that convention. It was so fixed with the avowed purpose, by the reputed author of the convention bill, of preventing such a representation.

Including and since the election of 1882 the popular vote of the Territory for Delegate in Congress has been Democratic by more than 1,500 majority at every election, though by reason of an equally unfair apportionment for the election of members of the Legislature (which was made the basis of the apportionment for the election of the convention), the several Legislatures have uniformly been Republican.

To illustrate that unfairness a few examples will suffice. The counties of Colfax and Mora are contiguous northern counties. At the last general election they cast, respectively, 1,680 and 2,212 votes, or an aggregate of 3,892—Democratic by majorities of 168 and 700 respectively. They were each allowed four delegates in the convention, making eight. The county of Bernalillo is Republican by 430 majority. It has a voting population of 3,564, 328 less than Colfax and Mora, yet was given ten delegates, two more than was allowed the larger number of voters in Colfax and Mora.

The Democratic county of Doña Ana, with 2,015 voters, was allowed three delegates, while the Republican county of Valencia, with 2,064 voters, was allowed six.

The Democratic county of Grant, with 2,297 voters, had three delegates, while the Republican county of Socorro, with 2,524 voters, had six.

These data were before the convention and there can be no justification of these inequalities.

These constitute one-half of the counties and more than one-half the population of the Territory, and fairly illustrate the character of the system of apportionment that has prevailed in the election of our Legislatures and of delegates to this constitutional convention.

To have gone into that election under such conditions would have been folly and suicidal.

The Democrats were practically and intentionally disfranchised, but, unwilling to be placed in the attitude of obstructionists until all efforts for a compromise should have failed, it was determined to seek an arrangement whereby this unjust disparity could be at least partially remedied, and they were permitted, without an absolute sacrifice of self-respect, to contest the election of delegates to the convention.

Accordingly a conference between the central committees of the two political parties was asked and had.

The whole number of delegates to the convention was 73. Though in a large majority on the popular vote and believing themselves entitled to and could elect, with a fair apportionment, a corresponding majority of the delegates, the Democratic committee proposed to concede to the Republicans, as the basis of an arrangement under which they would consent to go into the election, a majority of 5 in the convention.

That more than fair proposition was rejected by the Republican committee, and it was then determined to take no part in the election.

It is now proposed by the partisan majority in this House to disregard the fair and just enabling act introduced by the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. JOSEPH] and to foist this partisan constitution on the people of that Territory. The apportionment for the members of the Legislature is based upon substantially the same unequal representation which was adopted for the election of the constitutional convention. Hence it seems that New Mexico, which has more population than Wyoming and Idaho combined, is to be either kept out of the Union or brought in under a constitution which will effectually suppress the Democratic majority in the Territory.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have desired, as I have said, that these four Territories, New Mexico, Arizona, Idaho, and Wyoming, should be treated alike; that conventions should be held just as was done in the case of the four States which were brought into the Union by the action of the last Congress—conventions in pursuance of law, the election of delegates and the vote upon the ratification or rejection of the constitution being conducted with proper solemnity of law and under due penalties. In the present case of Wyoming we do not find these conditions met. This movement for the statehood of Wyoming is not based upon any legal enactment either by Congress or of the Territorial Legislature.

The gentlemen on the other side—the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] in opening this case and the Delegate from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY]—have stated that the convention was held in pursuance of—what? Of an act of Congress or of the Territorial Legislature? Not at all; but in pursuance of the provisions of a bill which was pending in the Senate of the United States in the last Congress, and which did not pass that body, although the majority there was Republican. And if it was pending in that body during the last Congress and did not pass, I have the right to assume it was the judgment of the Republican majority in that body they did not want to pass it.

The House had already recommended a bill for the admission of Wyoming into the Union, and the Republican Senate had recommended one, and if that Republican majority desired to pass it they would have done so; and gentlemen assign as an excuse for inaugurating the statehood convention without any enactment that there was pending a bill in Congress for that purpose. Why not wait until Congress passes the bill or until the Legislature of the Territory could call a convention and authorize a legal election?

But gentlemen claim there was precedent for this unauthorized calling of the convention. There is no precedent for the movement which has brought this constitution here. In the State of California there was a constitution formed without an enabling act of Congress and without any act of the Territorial Legislature because there was no Territorial government in California. When California was admitted into the Union there was a government there which was a part of the Government of Mexico, and that government came into the Union on the cession of that Territory to the United States.

The SPEAKER. The hour has expired. Does the gentleman desire to continue?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will occupy the remainder of the time allowed to this side of the House.

There was, therefore, established a military government in California, unauthorized, except by the orders of the President of the United States, to supersede the Government of that conquered territory. That military commander, acting on the necessities of the case, called an election for delegates to a constitutional convention. It was called under the sanction of the military power. It was the best and only course that could be pursued. It was warranted by the necessities of the case, that where no government exists some must be instituted. The convention was held, a constitution was formulated, submitted to popular vote, ratified, and a government was set in motion.

A State government in California was running, with both branches of the Legislature, with judges of the circuit and districts courts, and with all the minor officers executing the functions of the law for nearly one year before California was admitted into the Union. That was no precedent for this case. Wyoming had a government authorized by Congress having all the functions of a political entity, of a body politic. It was a government instituted in pursuance of a law of Congress, and there was no pretext or excuse for any portion of the citizens to institute a government hostile to that, and which could have had no validity unless it could supersede the existing government.

The governor, in the case of Wyoming, without any authority of the Legislature, without any authority of Congress, issued a proclamation calling for an election of delegates, and divided the Territory into election districts and prescribed the number of persons to be elected as delegates. That convention was held, a convention which should have been composed of fifty-five members according to the call of the governor, but when the constitution, on the 30th of September last, was signed, there were only thirty-nine members present to affix their names to that instrument.

Gentlemen on the other side have given an excuse for that not quite satisfactory. The delegates wanted to go home, and could not remain to sign their names. I suppose they did want to go home and did not want to remain to sign this constitution.

This constitution was promulgated on the 30th day of September last and submitted to a popular vote without any law authorizing it. There were only thirty-five days after this constitution was submitted to a vote until it was voted on, namely, on November 5; and at that election but 6,000 people, men and women both voting, came to the polls and voted for the constitution, while 1,900 or nearly 2,000 voted against it. Eight thousand voters participated in the adoption of that constitution. As many illegal votes could have been polled as any one might have chosen to put into the ballot-boxes. It is claimed that one place 300 votes were cast for this constitution in a back room of a drug-store where only three persons participated; and these 300 fraudulent votes are a part of these 6,000 which gave this constitution validity. This fraud was perpetrated in the town of Newcastle, in Crook County, and a cigar-box was used for a ballot-box.

In this way this constitution has come into existence. And I assert again it has no validity, no binding force, no authority whatever, except what may be given to it by Congress. And I want to know whether this House is ready to give it that validity which the law has not given to it up to this time.

I insist this Territory should come into the Union in an orderly way, in pursuance of an act of Congress or of the Territorial Legislature. And in order to secure its admission in an orderly way the minority of the Committee on Territories have proposed some amendments to this bill which ought to be voted on and adopted to-day. I ask gentlemen who are going to vote on these amendments to give them careful consideration by reading the "Views of the minority," where they are set forth at length. The amendments are just in themselves, and I commend them to the favorable action of the House to be adopted in connection with this bill.

The first amendment, Mr. Speaker, is to the effect that instead of the immediate admission of Wyoming under this constitution a convention should be held in pursuance of the law of Congress, an election for members of which shall be held in June next, the convention to assemble in July, and the constitution so framed to be submitted to a vote of the people to be ratified by a majority of the male voters of the Territory over twenty-one years of age, who are otherwise qualified; and that when the constitution as so made is adopted then the same procedure shall take place as was had in regard to the two Dakotas, to Montana, and Washington: that the President of the United States shall issue his proclamation, as in the case of the four States mentioned, and thus bring Wyoming into the Union. This is treating that Territory just as the other four were treated, and certainly Wyoming has no right to claim any other advantage.

Now, I want to ask gentlemen whether any injustice could possibly be done by this arrangement? Under this amendment the Territory of Wyoming can be here as a State when Congress assembles in December next. Is that not time enough for a Territory with not over 70,000 population to be admitted? Is that not time enough when it is the least of the four in population and resources now seeking admission? Why, New Mexico, as I have already stated, has a larger population to-day than both Wyoming and Idaho combined.

I have stated that, in submitting the question of the election of delegates and the ratifying of the constitution by the people, the suffrage should be confined to the male citizens over twenty-one years of age. Why? Because the Congress of the United States has never authorized Wyoming to adopt female suffrage in that Territory. On the contrary, it has been expressly prohibited, and I call the attention of the House to the act passed by Congress for the organization of the Territory, approved on the 25th day of July, 1868. I respectfully request gentlemen to give their attention to the reading of this statute. This is entitled "An act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Wyoming," and section 5 is as follows:

That every male citizen of the United States, above the age of twenty-one years, including persons who shall have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, and shall be residents of said Territory at the time of the passage of this act, shall be entitled to vote at the first and all subsequent elections in the Territory, and shall be eligible to hold any office in said Territory, etc.

And it is further provided—

That the right of suffrage and the right to hold office shall be exercised only by citizens of the United States, etc.

That is the enabling act, or rather the act of Congress organizing that Territory. Similar provisions were embodied in the organization of the Territory of Washington, and in that Territory a few years ago a case arose which settles this question as far as precedents are concerned.

The Legislature of the Territory passed a bill authorizing female suffrage. A case arising under that act went to the supreme court of the Territory, and will be found reported in the third volume of Washington Territory Reports, wherein the court held that the word "citizen," in the act establishing the Territory of Washington, which is the same in Wyoming, meant male citizen, and declared the act allowing female suffrage to be unconstitutional.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON], in his remarks on this bill on yesterday, referred to this case, and clearly and forcibly demonstrated that the Territory of Wyoming had violated the law of Congress by allowing female suffrage. I desire to call the attention of the House further to that case.

The case was very fully argued, and a very able and elaborate decision is reported in the volume to which I have referred, beginning on page 599. The plaintiff in the case was named Nevada M. Bloomer, and the suit was against John Todd, J. E. Gandy, and H. A. Clarke, judges of election. The plaintiff sued the judges of election who had conducted the municipal election at Spokane Falls for refusing to receive her ballot.

In that case the supreme court of Washington held that under the colonial laws, under the English law, and under the law existing when the Constitution was established, as well as under the laws prevailing at the time of the passage of the act organizing the Territory of Washington, it was the universally accepted doctrine that suffrage was confined to male citizens.

In the opinion the court say:

In the State courts a long line of decisions upon the same subject-matter continues to be followed, even though the general sense thus given to the words are not satisfactory to the courts of a later date. The doctrine of stare decisis is applicable in its full force within the territorial jurisdiction of the courts making such decisions, and this rule is usually followed because it is deemed better to follow that which is already established rather than reopen a question and thereby disturb rights once adjusted. The construction of statutes and constitutions should be uniform and unvarying. They should not be made to mean to-day one thing and another thing to-morrow or at any subsequent time. If the interpretation or construction put upon it by the court is unsatisfactory, it is, in this country, in the power of the people to obviate the difficulty by a new constitution, or an amendment thereto, or by changing a statute.

It is for this purpose that constitutions are made; that there may be stability in the government which thus furnishes the fundamental law; that varying moods of public opinion, clamors of the populace, or even public sentiment, shall not affect the public law of the land, and thus leave us without any stable and unchanged guide—when the public passions or resentment of the populace might carry the state out upon a sea of revolution, with only passion for a guide.—Bloomer vs. Todd et al., 3 Washington Territory Reports, page 614.

And again, referring to the Robinson case, 131 Massachusetts Reports, decided by Chief-Justice Gray, the learned counsel for the election judges in their argument state the law as follows, and this view was fully sustained by the court:

The word "citizen" arose for consideration in that case. The same rule of construction which should be applied here was applied there. The history of the common and statute law is carefully and elaborately stated, showing the relation borne the government by females, both under our own and the English systems, and the conclusion is there reached, as we insist it must be here reached, that, while the law is fully broad enough to include females in its provision, yet it was not so intended, and, therefore, must be limited by judicial construction.—Id., page 607.

The opinion of the supreme court of Washington Territory in the Bloomer case is one of the ablest and most conclusive I have ever read. It is supported by an unbroken line of authorities, in this country and in England, and to every unprejudiced mind it must be regarded as unassailable from any legal or constitutional standpoint.

That decision is supported by other decisions in similar cases; and I call the attention of gentlemen to the case referred to by the counsel in the Bloomer case of Lelia J. Robinson, decided by the supreme court of Massachusetts Mr. Justice Gray, then chief-justice of the supreme court of Massachusetts and now a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, rendering the decision. The court held in that case that an unmarried woman is not entitled to be examined for admission as an attorney and counselor of the court. And why? Because, said Mr. Chief-Justice Gray:

The word "citizen," when used in its most common and most comprehensive sense, doubtless includes women; but a woman is not by virtue of her citizenship vested by the Constitution of the United States or by the constitution of the Commonwealth with any absolute right, independent of legislation, to take part in the government, either as a voter or an officer, or to be admitted to practice as an attorney. (Minor vs. Happersett, 21 Wall., 162; Brodwell vs. Illinois, 16 Wall., 130.)

And numerous other cases are cited and references given in support of that position.

Again:

By the law of England, which was our law from the first settlement of the country until the American Revolution, the Crown, with all its inherent rights and prerogatives, might indeed descend to a woman or to an infant; but under the degree of a Queen, no woman, married or unmarried, could take part in the government of a state. Women could not sit in the House of Commons or the House of Lords, nor vote for members of Parliament. They could not take part in the administration of justice, either as judges or as jurors, etc.

Mr. STRUBLE. The gentleman thinks that that goes further than the mere question of admission to the bar?

Mr. SPRINGER. That was the question involved, but the court held in its opinion that it applied to voting as well as admission to the bar, and that the language of the Constitution, properly construed, meant male citizens only.

Mr. STRUBLE. And you are satisfied? You rely upon the dictum of the court?

Mr. SPRINGER. Well, the dictum of Mr. Justice Gray in a case properly before the court is, in my opinion, higher authority and better worthy of consideration than the unauthorized action of an unauthorized convention in the Territory of Wyoming.

Mr. STRUBLE. The gentleman means to say that the dictum of a court is more potent than the voice of 100,000 people voting.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman desires to appeal from the supreme court of Massachusetts in a case where it gave a unanimous opinion to a town meeting.

Mr. STRUBLE. The voice of 100,000 people in the Territory of Wyoming would have more weight.

Mr. SPRINGER. But 100,000 people did not vote. Only thirty-nine delegates signed the constitution, and only 6,000 voters, male and female, voted for the constitution, and they never considered for a moment the legal or constitutional question involved. The law granting female suffrage was passed by the Territorial Legislature, and the infallibility of such Legislatures has never been claimed.

Mr. Speaker, it has been asserted time and again that there was a severe snow-storm prevailing in that Territory on the day before the election and that this prevented the people from turning out on the day of the election. One would have supposed from the statements made that the elements had broken loose as never before known at that season of the year.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Not now.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I want to—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have in my hand the report of the majority of the committee in this case, and on page 3 I find this statement given by the committee as the reason why there was so small a vote in this Territory on the ratification of this constitution:

The small vote is satisfactorily explained by the memorial accompanying the constitution (Appendix F) and the argument of the Delegate.

First, I will call attention to the memorial which is given as the basis of this statement. The memorial says:

The constitution so framed was submitted as directed, according to the provisions of section 7 of Article XXI thereof, and was ratified by nearly five-sixths of the citizens voting thereon, by a vote small in itself, and yet large in view of the little opposition felt by the people, and of the facts that no other issue was presented, and that the day of the election followed one of the severest snow-storms ever known at that season and was also marked by extreme cold, rendering it practically impossible for the people of many precincts to reach the polls.

That is the statement, gentlemen, of this memorializing committee, indorsed by the majority of the Committee on Territories, and by the Delegate [Mr. CAREY] in his statement to the committee, and published in this report, wherein he stated:

The day being very inclement, a severe snow storm having prevailed the day before the election, no effort was made to get out the vote.

It occurred to me that our friends on the other side had emphasized this snow-storm rather "severely," and I concluded I would call upon the proper officer of the Weather Bureau to find out just what kind of weather they had in Wyoming on the day of election. [Laughter.] I, however, subsequently remembered that the day before election was the day on which this storm is alleged to have taken place.

I wrote to General Greely to get a statement of the weather on the day of the election. In reply General Greely sent me a statement of the weather in Wyoming on the 5th day of November, the day of election. I discovered on a careful examination that the allegation was that it was not the day of the election when the severe snow storm was, but the day before the election, and I wrote another note and asked him to send me the state of the weather on that day, and he has done so, and I will print in the RECORD the two notes I received from General Greely on that subject, and call the attention of the House to the condition of the weather in the Territory of Wyoming as revealed by the officials of the Signal Service Corps, not gotten up for political effect to railroad a constitution through this House. I desired to obtain the cold facts. (I use the word "cold" advisedly, in reference to cold facts.) There were only three stations in Wyoming at which observations could be taken, and I asked for stations in Montana, Salt Lake City, at Rapid City, S. Dak., and at Denver, Colo., and I have both of these statements here. That which is written in the first line of the table is the condition of the weather the day before the election and that which is written in the second line is the weather on the day of the election.

The letters of General Greely are as follows:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER,
Washington, D. C., March 18, 1890.

MY DEAR SIR: I beg to transmit herewith, as requested in your communication of the 17th instant, a statement of the weather in Wyoming Territory on November 5, 1889.

Sincerely yours,

A. W. GREELY, Chief Signal Officer.

HON. WILLIAM M. SPRINGER,
House of Representatives, Washington City.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER,
Washington, D. C., March 19, 1890.

MY DEAR MR. SPRINGER: I take pleasure in handing you herewith, as requested in your communication of the 18th instant, the additional data from November 4, 1889, for certain stations in Wyoming and contiguous territory.

Very respectfully,

A. W. GREELY, Chief Signal Officer.

HON. WILLIAM M. SPRINGER,
House of Representatives, Washington City.

The statement of the state of the weather in Wyoming Territory, etc., is as follows:

Table showing the observed maximum and minimum temperature; velocity, in miles, and direction of the wind; precipitation, in inches, and character of the weather at 8 a. m. and 8 p. m. (seventy-fifth meridian time) on November 4 and 5, 1889, at the stations specified.

SIGNAL OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON CITY, March 18, 1890; March 19, 1890.

Hon. WILLIAM M. SPRINGER, House of Representatives, Washington City.

A MEMBER. What was the state of the weather?

Mr. SPRINGER. At Cheyenne, Wyo., the capital of the Territory, the day before the election the maximum temperature was 25° above zero; at 8 p. m. it was 7.2° above zero. The maximum temperature on the day of the election was 30°.

Mr. CAREY. Where was that?

Mr. SPRINGER. At Cheyenne.

Mr. CAREY. I want to state that in the southern part of the Territory this has been the worst winter ever known.

Mr. SPRINGER. I prefer to take the report of the Weather Bureau to your statement, because I am going to discredit your statement about the weather at that time.

Mr. CAREY. That was in the southeast corner of the Territory.

Mr. COVERT. That was "the winter of their discontent."

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, it seems to have been "the winter of their discontent," but you will see before I get through that it was made "glorious summer" by the official reports of the Signal Service Corps. The temperature went up to 25° by noon on the day before the election and on the day of the election the temperature was 30° above, which would not be considered very cold in a dry atmosphere. In other parts of the Territory the thermometer indicated 46° above zero on the day of the election.

Now, as to the storm of wind blowing. At 8 o'clock in the morning at Cheyenne it was blowing at 5 miles an hour and at 8 o'clock in the evening it was blowing at 3 miles an hour. At other stations in the Territory there was a dead calm or a velocity of 2 miles an hour. [Laughter.]

At 8 o'clock in the morning the weather at Cheyenne was "cloudless" and at 8 o'clock in the evening there was a "cloudless" sky. On the day of the election it was even warmer than this, and even more cloudless and if possible a less velocity of wind. At Fort McKinney, in the northern part of the Territory, there was snow at 8 a. m. on the day before the election to the extent of six-one-hundredths of an inch. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAREY. Fort McKinney is the lowest part of—

Mr. SPRINGER. I will show you what your statement is worth. At Fort McKinney the precipitation was .06 of an inch, and the weather was cloudless the whole of the day before the election. [Laughter.] At Fort Washakie the thermometer went up in the course of the day to 28° above zero. The weather at Washakie was cloudless on the day of the election, and no precipitation whatever. [Renewed laughter.] It was cloudless nearly all the way through, as you will see by this statement, till we get down to Rapid City, in South Dakota, where the thermometer at 8 o'clock a. m. on the day before election registered 17.6, and at 8 o'clock p. m. 20.2, and where we found by meteorological observation a trace of snow—one-hundredth part of an inch of snow had fallen. [Laughter.]

There was a fierce gale blowing at the rate of 1 mile an hour at 8 p. m. the day before the election. [Renewed laughter.] The thermometer went up to 55° on the day of the election.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Has not the snow melted since it came into the hands of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SPRINGER. No; but your facts have melted away in view of the official reports. [Laughter.]

So that this great, severe snow-storm that kept all these people from the polls, this tremendous breeze that kept the people in their homes the day of the election and prevented them from voting, has dwindled down, when confronted with the official reports on the weather, to a gale blowing at the rate of 1 mile an hour, and the severe snow-storm to a trace of melted snow. [Renewed laughter.] These are the facts in the case.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman state the extent of that Territory in miles from one extreme to the other.

Mr. SPRINGER. These observations were taken at Cheyenne, at Fort McKinney, at Fort Washakie, in the Territory, and at Fort Custer, in Montana, at Salt Lake City, at Rapid City, at Denver, at all the stations in the Territory and all those around it. So that Wyoming was not only not in the midst of a snow-storm, but the surrounding country, as appears from these figures, was free from storms or severe cold. In Idaho, the Territory immediately west and northwest of Wyoming, there were 14,000 votes polled on November 5. There was as severe a storm there as there was in Wyoming.

The storm was not so severe as to keep the people of Idaho from the polls. Nothing of the kind. Now, Mr. Speaker, I assert that all this talk about a snow-storm keeping the people of Wyoming away from the polls has been exploded by these facts, and this shows the false pretenses that have been resorted to to get this House to give vitality to a constitution which the people of Wyoming refused to indorse. The people regarded that election as a farce and did not attend the polls. They were kept away from the polls, not by storms, but by their own disinclination to attend.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Not now; my time is too limited. The gentleman will excuse me. Now, we are asked to accept this constitution, which received but 6,000 votes, although the Delegate from Wyoming insists that there are 20,000 voters in the Territory and 100,000 people. Are those 100,000 people and those 20,000 voters in the Territory to have a constitution forced upon them by Congress, which received the sanction of only 6,000 votes, men and women both voting, and which can have no legal sanction whatever except what is given to it by this House and by the other House of Congress? I want to know whether we are prepared to accept a constitution which is so radical in its provisions and which has been gotten up in the manner I have pointed out.

Now, I desire to call the attention of the House to some of the provisions of this constitution briefly, because my time is short. The article on the question of suffrage, to which I take exception and which has been incorporated into this constitution, is as follows:

The rights of the citizens of the State of Wyoming to vote and hold office shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex. Both male and female citizens of this State shall equally enjoy all civil, political, and religious rights and privileges.

And in the bill of rights it is declared that suffrage is an inherent and inalienable right. I have shown, I think, already that the Territory of Wyoming had no right to admit women to the franchise in that Territory. They had no right to admit them, and hence the amendment which I propose. We do not deny the right of a State, properly constituted, to change its constitution and adopt female suffrage, but it must be done by the male voters, who are alone authorized to vote in all the States of the Union and who are alone authorized by the law of Congress to vote in the Territory of Wyoming. We insist, therefore, that this Territory must come into the Union in the regular way.

The first amendment we propose provides for the election of a convention to be composed of delegates elected in the usual way, just as was done in the cases of the two Dakotas and of Montana and Washington, and the submission of the constitution to the people. Then, if in this way, through the action of the male voters, they choose to have female suffrage, it will be their business and not ours. But I deny your right to force it upon them, just as you threaten to do by the passage of this bill.

There is no State in the Union whose constitution contains such a provision as this. No gentleman upon either side can predict the consequences which will come to this country if this principle is admitted into the constitution of one of the States of this Union, and I ask you to move slowly and deliberately before you take this radical departure from the policy of the fathers, from the policy which prevails in all the enlightened governments of the world. Before you depart from the settled convictions of the civilized governments of the world and plunge into a new and untried system of suffrage, I ask you at least to pause and give the subject that fair and deliberate consideration to which it is entitled.

We also offer another amendment, in case the first is voted down, to resubmit this constitution to the people at an election to be held under authority of law, where illegal voting can be prevented, an election to be held next November, at which the people shall vote for State officers, and at the same time shall vote "for female suffrage" or "against female suffrage," "for the eligibility of women to hold office and to sit on juries" or "against the eligibility of women to hold office and to sit on juries." If the majority of the people vote for the constitution, then the State is to be admitted upon that vote, as in the cases of the two Dakotas and Washington and Montana; and if they vote against female suffrage or against the eligibility of women to hold office and to sit on juries, then and in that event the constitution is to be amended in accordance with the vote and the will of the people so expressed. Can anything be more fair and reasonable than that?

If this amendment is rejected, we submit a third amendment, by which it is proposed to strike out the provision in the constitution granting female suffrage and confine the suffrage to males, and submit the amended constitution to the people, and if they vote "for the amended constitution," then and in that event the State shall come into the Union under that constitution without further action of Congress.

These are the amendments which we propose, and I assure you, gentlemen, that we have not delay in view. We have simply in view the orderly method of procedure in matters of this kind. Surely the question of admitting a State into this Union is one worthy of the careful and mature thought of this House and of the country. We ask you to proceed in this case in the careful, deliberate, orderly way in which we proceeded to the admission of States which came into the Union in the last Congress. We ask you to treat Wyoming now and Idaho afterwards just as we treated the four States which came in last year, and which were very glad to come in under that method. We ask you to deal justly with the people of Wyoming, and not force the constitution upon them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the admission of all these Territories into the Union. I do not agree with some of my colleagues who are opposed to admitting them now. I believe the time has come in the march of events when the power of this Union should move westward. These new States are coming here to vote for unlimited coinage of the silver dollar and I welcome them for that purpose. They are coming here to vote for an honest revision of the tariff, in the interest of the people of the whole country, and I welcome them here for that purpose. They are coming here to vote down the trusts and the great monopolies that are grinding the life-blood out of the people of the West, and I welcome them here for that purpose.

They are coming here in the near future, Mr. Speaker, however much you may count upon their votes now, to take their places with the other Democratic States of the Union, and I do not want to retard them a moment. Let them come. The sooner they come here the better it will be for the country, and I welcome them to an equality with the other States of the Union. But, Mr. Speaker, I insist that they must come in in a regular, fair, and orderly way, in a way which will voice the sentiment of the people, and not come in to meet a partisan exigency. We should not tie the hands of the people and prevent the legal expression of their will—

Mr. MOREY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOREY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question before he sits down. I desire to ask him as a member of the committee this question: The minority has made three several recommendations of amendments to this bill. Now, I desire to ask the gentleman if the minority propose any amendment except those which look to the striking out of the clause in this constitution granting female suffrage and the clause making ability to read the Constitution a condition of voting. Do you make any other recommendations than those?

Mr. SPRINGER. We do. We recommend the submission of the whole question to the people, at an election to be held in pursuance of an act of Congress, at which delegates will be elected to a constitutional convention, which will frame an entirely new constitution, and this whole instrument now before Congress be swept away, as it ought to be, in my judgment, in order to give the people a chance to make their own constitution, instead of having one forced upon them.

Mr. MOREY. But is there any single amendment proposed by the minority to strike out anything else except what I have stated?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes!

Mr. MOREY. I say there is not.

Mr. SPRINGER. We propose to wipe it all out, and failing in that we propose to resubmit the constitution already framed to the people, apart from the question of female suffrage, which is to be submitted separately. If this amendment should fail we propose to strike female suffrage from the constitution and resubmit the amended constitution to the people for ratification or rejection.

Mr. Speaker, there were some other matters to which I desired to call attention, but my time having expired I can not do so. I thank the House for the kind attention I have received.

Mr. STRUBLE. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to be able to occupy nearly all of the time remaining to this side, but I understand there are several gentlemen who wish a few minutes each, and I therefore, ask the Chair to call time on me when I shall have spoken twelve minutes.

Mr. Speaker, no one can say much on a great question like this in so short a time, but I wish, first, to direct attention briefly to the point made by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNES], my colleague on the Committee on Territories, who has cited the only authority presented here, according to my present recollection, going in the direction of a condemnation of the movement and action of the people of Wyoming in the steps they have taken looking to the admission of that Territory into the Union, and hereafter will, if time permits, consider one or more other points of interest.

The gentleman cited an authority found in 7 Howard, the Rhode Island case (Luther, plaintiff in error, vs. Borden et al.), and he read from the argument of Mr. Webster, who was one of the attorneys for the defendant in error. He did not read from Mr. Webster, the great constitutional lawyer and statesman, speaking in the Senate of the United States or delivering an opinion as a jurist, but from Daniel Webster speaking as the paid attorney of one of the parties to the suit.

I admit, sir, that the language of Mr. Webster, speaking only as a paid attorney, is entitled to great respect and consideration at our hands; but when we consider the facts in that noted trial, to which I will briefly advert, it will be seen that the opinion of Mr. Webster can not be properly claimed to be in conflict with the principles that are applicable to the case before the House.

Now, what were the facts in that case? They were that, in opposition to the old chartered government, in opposition to the steps taken by that government to have a new constitution framed, in opposition to the resolution passed by the legal authorities and constituted government of Rhode Island, certain citizens of that State, for their own reasons and clearly in violation of established government, undertook to have a constitution framed and adopted. They proceeded, in violence and in clear revolution, to overthrow the established authority of the State government which, in earlier and later form, ran back to 1663.

In other words, by a violent movement, assuming they had the authority, against the established government and law of their State, they sought to erect a constitution in opposition to, and in overthrow of, the legally existing one. Mr. Webster was on the side of the State government, and of course took the position which the State authorities maintained in opposition to the purpose of those citizens who, without sanction of law and against law, proposed to establish a new constitution.

Is there any parallel, I ask members of this House, I ask the gentleman from Georgia, between the Rhode Island case and the peaceable, orderly movement of one hundred thousand people in Wyoming in the direction, not of revolution, Mr. Speaker, but of evolution, from Territorial bondage toward the flag and the Constitution of the Federal Government, toward a rightful and equal participation in governmental affairs, the highest aim and the dearest political right of American freemen?

Is there an analogy between this case cited by my distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. BARNES] and this community out upon the plains with a population of 100,000 people gathered from all sections, from colleges, from farms, from ranches, from all of the avocations of life, enterprising, intelligent, loyal? Yet here this community which, in the spirit of patriotism, in the spirit of honest desire, seeks to become one of the States of this Union, must be characterized by such gentlemen as my colleague on the committee, Mr. SPRINGER, of Illinois, as proceeding in violation of law and of the Constitution, as guilty of violent and revolutionary conduct. Such a position as this can not be too strongly condemned.

If these people were acting in opposition to the law of Congress, if there were in the statute-book a single sentence in condemnation of this manner of proceeding, if Congress had ever pronounced against woman suffrage, if Congress had ever pronounced against compulsory education, if Congress had ever inveighed against educational qualifications of electors, if Congress had put in the way of this peaceable proceeding any section of law, I would have felt it my duty to act otherwise than I have; but nowhere in the statute-book, nowhere in the Constitution or laws can be found anything which says to that people or any other of similar situation, "You shall not put yourselves in harmonious relations with the States of the Union. You shall not by public, peaceable, and orderly methods, such as the people of Wyoming adopted, be permitted respectful and successful hearing at the hands of the Congress of the United States in an honorable attempt to gain admission as a State.

Now, we are told that woman suffrage is not to be allowed in Wyoming, and I wish to speak briefly to this point. It is conceded by gentlemen on the other side that not a line is to be found in the Constitution denying to Wyoming the right to establish woman suffrage. It is conceded a State admitted into the Union may properly provide for woman suffrage. If it is constitutional, then, for a State already admitted to provide for female suffrage, as a legal proposition it is competent here and now for Congress to permit this community of 100,000 people, acting peaceably and deliberately, to form their constitution admitting women in that new State to the elective franchise. There is no escape from this legal proposition.

What then have we to do? Shall we, as the gentleman from Illinois would have us do, send this constitution back with the condemnation of the House of Representatives, with the condemnation of the Congress of the United States, and say to Wyoming, "You shall not come into the Union until you take care that no innovation is made in reference to the right of suffrage; you shall not come in until you condemn the right of women to vote; you shall not come in until you have first condemned that which for years you have allowed and approved?"

Mr. Speaker, for nearly a quarter of a century the people of this Territory have had woman suffrage within their borders. It has been demonstrated to their satisfaction. The women of Wyoming have for about twenty years exercised the right of suffrage; have gone to the polls and deposited their ballots. They have served on juries. They have answered all reasonable demands of citizenship in their experience as electors under Territorial law, and because of these facts the men of the Territory, uniting without reference to party, have consented to the provisions continuing to them the right of suffrage.

It is now properly in their constitution for future State government, and placed there by the deliberate act of a constitutional convention composed of men only, Democrats and Republicans, and with but one dissenting voice. They ask that it may remain in and continue a part of their constitution, and I maintain it is our duty to permit the people of Wyoming, irrespective of our individual views, to settle this question for themselves now and hereafter. Congress has not in all these twenty years pronounced against the right of female suffrage in Wyoming; has never by statute expressed disapproval of the legislation of that Territory conferring this privilege, and shall we now, after so long a time, after full knowledge of what the people of that Territory have done in allowing women to participate in the suffrage—shall we now, when this constitution of State government is presented, deny this right granted in that constitution? I insist it comes with bad grace from gentlemen on that side of the Chamber, after this long acquiescence, to say, "We will not have you as a member of this Union of States unless you will go back on your record, unless you will repeal your laws, unless you will change your constitution, unless you will narrow down the scope of republicanism, of true democracy, and limit the right of suffrage in Wyoming, in opposition to the will of the people, to men alone."

Are we then willing to record here and now that we deny the constitutional right of a loyal, intelligent body of American citizens, living under Territorial form, to frame a constitution in accordance with their highest and best judgment, that instrument containing not a single proposition which can rightly be condemned as unrepugnant? I am unwilling to assume this attitude. I am unwilling to make such a record. I am unwilling thus to condemn the highest principle of local self-government.

To sustain this constitution, to recognize this right of the people in the Territories to decide for themselves these local questions, in no manner commits any of us to the abstract principle of female suffrage. We do not by affirmative action on this measure assert that we favor the extension of this suffrage to other States.

We do no more than affirm our allegiance to the Constitution of our country, which contemplates that the people of each State, old or new, may ordain their own constitutional forms, they being republican in character. We declare that we will not, because we may differ as to the wisdom of a policy clearly admissible and proper in a constitutional sense, force upon the people of a new State our individual views; and while we may disapprove certain propositions in this instrument, this disapproval may not and should not lead us in the least to hesitate when passing on a question of highest privilege to the citizens of a State or Territory.

As a member of this House and as a member of the Committee on the Territories, the majority of whom are responsible for the favorable recommendation on this bill, it affords me more than ordinary gratification to believe there will be no hesitation with members on this side the Chamber in voting for the admission of the Territory of Wyoming on this constitution.

Her people have been long in Territorial condition; they have proven their capacity for intelligent and successful State government; they have made satisfactory exhibit of material conditions assuring us that within her borders are inexhaustible resources to sustain a large permanent population; they have given abundant evidence of their progressive Americanism, of their devotion to our forms of Government, and now they stand in dignified but respectful manliness and womanliness at the doors of our great American Union and pray that exalted but constitutional boon, the right to be of us and with us in all the further great and grand development awaiting the mightiest Republic on which the sun ever shone. Let us answer them as becomes their equals. [Applause.]

Mr. BAKER. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the question of the introduction of new States into the Union has always been a question of political power and political action. It has so happened that from the very beginning of this Government, at least as far back as the memory of men now living extends, the Democratic party, since the downfall of slavery, since it attempted to use the introduction of States to keep up the political power of slavery on this continent, has always opposed the admission of new States into the Union. And especially has the Democratic party had its eye of unqualified vengeance and opposition upon the introduction of every State that has been carved out of that magnificent territory over which the ægis of the great declaration of liberty, the ordinance of 1787, was cast. Hostility, either open and declared, as now, or covert and insinuating, as in the Fiftieth Congress, has always been the policy of the Democratic party.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], a member of the Committee on Territories, who has succeeded, by some process of which I am not acquainted, in having himself embalmed in a great publication as having achieved the most remarkable feat of parliamentary work ever accomplished on this continent, in securing the admission of the Dakotas, Washington, and Montana, was one of the most insidious, persistent, and unrelenting enemies of the admission of either of these magnificent States into the Union; and he was driven ultimately, by the breaking down of the solid front of his own side under the leadership of the gallant gentleman from New York, whose vacancy here I so much regret, to change front.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman is entirely mistaken in his statement.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I was here myself, and I know exactly what was done.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then the gentleman does not state what was done.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The scheme under which one of the Dakotas was passed in this House was a scheme to defeat ultimately the result that we worked out; and when the bill came back from the Senate with all four of the States in it, which proposition had been offered as a Republican measure, the break that was made by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] alone made such a break on that side as enabled us to concur in the action of the Senate, and thus we admitted the four new States.

Now, it is said that by this action, proposed here to-day, we are to commit ourselves to the doctrine of female suffrage now existing by law in the Territory of Wyoming. In that connection, Mr. Speaker, I wish to supplement what has been so well said by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STUBBLE], by referring to this legal proposition: Nowhere in the Constitution of the United States is there any condition made in regard to the qualification of an elector, except that we forbid any State in the Union to deprive any person of the right to vote because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Beyond that, every question of the qualification of the voter is left to the State itself.

Now, then, what do we do in the case of Wyoming that is practically different from the case of the two Dakotas and Montana? In the case of these States we admitted them with constitutions that conferred suffrage solely upon males, and not females, but to-day either one of these States may change its constitution, without any consent by or consultation with the General Government, and confer suffrage upon the women of those States. So that we have never undertaken to put up a barrier against the power of the State to confer suffrage upon anybody, but have simply forbidden them to withdraw suffrage from the colored people or refuse to confer suffrage upon any man, otherwise qualified, by reason of race or color. So the State of Wyoming, when it comes into the Union under that constitution allowing female suffrage, a provision recognized in the Constitution, would have power to change it the next day, without notice to the General Government and without its consent.

The other States that have come in with exclusive male suffrage in their constitutions have the power to change these provisions to-day or to-morrow or any day that they see proper. A vote here, therefore, for the admission of Wyoming can not be construed by any possible logic into a vote in favor of the doctrine of female suffrage, a doctrine which, I wish to say in this connection, I am not at all alarmed about, so far as I am personally concerned. But my vote here can never fairly or justly be considered or understood to mean that in accepting this constitution I voted in favor of female suffrage. But the admission of Wyoming is a political question, and the Republican party on this floor is not afraid of it and ought not to be afraid to meet and dispose of it. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes remaining for the debate, I wish to call the attention of the House to the situation as to the proposed State of Wyoming. Wyoming asks admission under the constitution which is presented here and is before this House, desiring no other privileges than have been conferred upon each of the other States on their admission to the Union. She comes asking to be admitted upon an equality with the other States, under a bill and with a constitution which fit each other; the constitution fits the bill and the bill fits the constitution completely and in all particulars.

It has been said by gentlemen on the other side, so many of whom have been agonizing in spasms about this matter for the last twenty-four hours—by my honored friend from Alabama [Mr. OATES]—that it is going to result in breaking down this great Republic; that we are going to abdicate in favor of women in the government of this land. My friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] says that it is an innovation on things; that it is a purely Republican measure; that this bill had better be changed in its title and made to read, "A bill to increase the electoral vote in favor of the Republican candidate for President in 1892." My good friend from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] seems to think it is to overturn and overthrow the whole system of land laws of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to all of these gentlemen and to this House that the bill is exactly, in its land provisions, like all the bills, in respect of those things providing for the admission of the other States, that have been passed by Congress heretofore. Suppose we defeat the bill—this Republican measure, as my friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] calls it—what is the result? Why, the result is a Democratic victory, according to my friend. If the bill prevails and Wyoming comes into the Union, as she has a constitutional right to do, then, according to my friend, it is a Republican triumph, and Republicanism is guaranteed, under a republican constitution, to a great State, which is now ready to perform the full functions of statehood and enter upon its duties as a member of the Union in conjunction with all her sister States.

My good friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] in his minority report says that they do not care to put in the way of Wyoming any obstructions to immediate admission; and yet he has fought the bill from its introduction up to this time with all the power at his command.

He did the same thing during the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses as to the Dakotas. During both those Congresses he stood here upon this floor insisting with great earnestness at one time that Dakota was entitled to admission into the Union only as a whole, and then he turned square around and insisted that it should be divided upon the Missouri River line and that line extended to the Canadian frontier.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BAKER. I am not mistaken. For thirteen years the Democratic party stood solidly against the admission of the two Dakotas, until, forsooth, they could hook on Montana and Washington, under the expectation that two Democratic States would be secured to offset the two Dakotas, which it was thought would be Republican. But they did not get the two Democratic States. Of course our Democratic friends think they may still secure the Democratic Senators from Montana. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHINGTON. You beat us.

Mr. BAKER. Yes, in spite of all unrighteous opposition the Republicans have prevailed in the State of Montana, and have secured their Senators, very much to the regret of my friend from Illinois, notwithstanding his opposition to the Dakotas. Following the record made during ten years of consistent opposition to the Dakotas, he has had himself written up as being their firmest friend. In the Magazine of Poetry he is already embalmed in history as the one person entitled to all credit for the admission of the four States last admitted. Hear what he has procured to be said of himself. I read from the July number of the Magazine of Poetry, page 331:

The Hon. WILLIAM M. SPRINGER, of Illinois, the distinguished member of Congress who for many years has ably represented the district which once sent Abraham Lincoln to the National House, and whose name will go to the future crowned with honor, as he was author and manager of the bill by which the two Dakotas, Montana, and Washington were admitted to statehood—a parliamentary triumph without a precedent.

[Cries of "Hear!" "Hear!" and laughter.]

The Magazine of Poetry, Mr. Speaker. It is wonderful.

Mr. MOREY. I desire to know whether that is accompanied with a chromo. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I say that the position of my friend from Illinois has not been inconsistent. Emerson says that "consistency is a bugbear to men of small minds;" but consistency is not a bugbear to my friend from Illinois. He stands here now and wants the Democratic party to be solid with him against the admission of Wyoming when not a voice is heard from Wyoming from the Democratic party, from the Republican party, or from anybody in opposition to the admission of that State to-day.

In a little while the Magazine of Poetry will no doubt record him as the faithful advocate of Wyoming.

Such is the attitude of my friend from Illinois, which I firmly believe is not dictated or supported by the solid Democratic party in this country or in this House. Mr. Speaker, we owe it to Wyoming, we owe it to ourselves that she shall be admitted upon the constitution which they have adopted, and that we shall not undertake to dictate to them what they shall have in their constitution or what they shall not have. They have the right to frame a constitution which shall be republican in form. This they have done. We do not propose to vote it up nor do we propose to vote it down, but we simply vote in favor of Wyoming's right of local self-government, a right guaranteed by the Constitution to every community and to every State. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the Clerk will read the special order.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk an amendment.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the previous question is considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is now ordered, and the House is pursuing the order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am not surprised that the gentleman desires to cut off amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is not in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am aware of that. But I now send to the Clerk's desk and move the adoption of the first amendment recommended by the minority of the Committee on the Territories.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out sections 1 and 2 of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the following, and number the other sections accordingly:

"Sec. 1. That the inhabitants of all that part of the area of the United States now constituting the Territory of Wyoming, as at present described, may become the State of Wyoming, as hereinafter provided.

"Sec. 2. That all male persons who shall have resided within the limits of said proposed State for sixty days, and are otherwise qualified by the laws of said Territory to vote for representatives to the Legislative Assembly thereof, are hereby authorized to vote for and choose delegates to form a convention in said Territory; and the qualifications for delegates to such convention shall be such as, by the laws of said Territory, persons are required to possess to be eligible to the Legislative Assembly thereof; and the aforesaid delegates to form said convention shall be apportioned among the several counties within the limits of the proposed State, in proportion to the aggregate number of votes in each of said counties for Delegate in Congress at the election held in said Territory on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, 1888. One delegate shall be allowed for every 300 votes cast in each county and one delegate for any fraction of 150 votes cast in each county. That said apportionment shall be made by the governor, the chief justice, and the United States attorney of said Territory; and the governor of said Territory shall, by proclamation, order an election of the delegates aforesaid in said Territory to be held on the Tuesday after the first Monday in June, 1890, which proclamation shall be issued within thirty days after the passage of this act; and such election shall be conducted, the returns made, the result ascertained, and the certificates to persons elected to such convention issued in the same manner as is prescribed by the laws of the said Territory regulating elections therein for Delegate to Congress. All male persons resident in said proposed State, who are qualified voters of said Territory, as herein provided, shall be entitled to vote upon the election of delegates, and upon the ratification or rejection of the constitution, under such rules and regulation as said convention may prescribe, not in conflict with this act, but no educational qualification shall be required of voters at either of said elections.

"Sec. 3. That the delegates to the convention thus elected shall meet at the seat of government of said Territory on the 1st day of July, 1890, and after organization shall declare, on behalf of the people of said proposed State, that they adopt the Constitution of the United States; whereupon the said convention shall be, and is hereby, authorized to form a constitution and State government for said proposed State. The constitution shall be republican in form, and make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, except as to Indians not taxed, and not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence. And said convention shall provide, by ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State:

"First, that perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and that no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested, in person or property, on account of his or her mode of religious worship;

"Second, that the people inhabiting said proposed State do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within the boundaries thereof, and to all lands lying within said limits owned or held by any Indian or Indian tribes; and that until the title thereto shall have been extinguished by the United States the same shall be and remain subject to the disposition of the United States, and said Indian lands shall remain under the absolute jurisdiction and control of the Congress of the United States; that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States residing without the State shall never be taxed at a higher rate than the lands belonging to residents thereof; that no taxes shall be imposed by the State on lands or property therein belonging to or which may hereafter be purchased by the United States or reserved for its use; but nothing herein, or in the ordinance herein provided for, shall preclude the said State from taxing, as other lands are taxed, any lands owned or held by any Indian who has severed his tribal relations, and has obtained from the United States or from any person a title thereto by patent or other grant, save and except such lands as have been or may be granted to any Indian or Indians under any act of Congress containing a provision exempting the lands thus granted from taxation; but said ordinance shall provide that all such lands shall be exempt from taxation by said State so long and to such extent as such act of Congress may prescribe;

"Third, that the debts and liabilities of said Territory shall be assumed and paid by the said State; and

"Fourth, that provision shall be made for the establishment and maintenance of a system of public schools, which shall be open to all the children of said State and free from sectarian control.

"Sec. 4. That in case a constitution and State government shall be formed in compliance with the provisions of this act, the convention forming the same shall provide by ordinance for submitting said constitution to the people of said State for their ratification or rejection, at an election to be held in said Territory on the Tuesday after the first Monday of November, 1890, at which election the qualified voters of said proposed State shall vote directly for or against the proposed constitution, and for or against any provisions separately submitted. The returns of said election shall be made to the secretary of said Territory, who, with the governor and chief-justice thereof, or any two of them, shall canvass the same; and if a majority of the legal votes cast on that question shall be for the constitution, the governor shall certify the result to the President of the United States, together with a statement of the votes cast thereon and upon separate articles or propositions, and a copy of said constitution, articles, propositions, and ordinances. And if the constitution and government of said proposed State are republican in form and if all the provisions of this act have been complied with in the formation thereof, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation announcing the result of said election, and thereupon the proposed State of Wyoming shall be deemed admitted by Congress into the Union under and by virtue of this act on an equal footing with the original States from and after the date of said proclamation: Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall, in any wise, interfere with the right and ownership of the United States to the Yellowstone National Park reservation and the exclusive control over the same by the United States."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was put; and the Speaker announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 131, nays 138, not voting 60; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

The following-named members were announced as paired until further notice:

Mr. FLOOD with Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina.

Mr. FINLEY with Mr. CANDLER, of Georgia.

Mr. STEPHENSON with Mr. SKINNER.

Mr. KNAPP with Mr. STAHLNECKER.

Mr. GIFFORD with Mr. TURPIN.

Mr. THOMPSON with Mr. TURNER, of Georgia.

Mr. HOPKINS with Mr. BLOUNT.

Mr. THOMAS M. BROWNE with Mr. KERR, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. LANSING with Mr. WILEY.

Mr. WILBER with Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania.

The following-named members were announced as paired on this vote:

Mr. BROSIUS with Mr. QUINN.

Mr. SPOONER with Mr. PHELAN.

Mr. DE HAVEN with Mr. MANSUR.

Mr. COWLES was announced as paired with Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan, on all political questions, from March 22 until April 1.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee, with Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana, for this day.

Mr. LIND with Mr. BOATNER, for this day.

Mr. BAKER. I ask unanimous consent that the recapitulation of the names of members voting be dispensed with.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object. I think we had better have the names read, not for delay, but to verify the vote, as it is a very important one.

The Clerk recapitulated the names.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I observed that the name of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TARSNEY] was read in the list of those who voted in the negative. I understand that he voted in the affirmative.

Mr. BAKER. We do not want to go back on the returns. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. The returns are not correct.

Mr. TARSNEY. I answered distinctly in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The mistake was made in recording. The mark was placed opposite the name of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TARSNEY] instead of opposite the name of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR]. The gentleman from Missouri will be recorded in the affirmative.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk the second amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add to section 1 the following:

"Provided, That there shall be an election in the Territory of Wyoming on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, 1890, for a Representative in Congress to the Fifty-first and Fifty-second Congresses, and for the State, judicial, and legislative officers, whose terms of office are created by the proposed constitution of the State of Wyoming, and such county, precinct, and municipal officers as may be provided for under such constitution and under the laws of the Territory of Wyoming; but no county or township officers shall be elected unless their terms are about to expire under the laws of the Territory creating such offices. At said election every male citizen of the United States who is otherwise qualified under the laws of the Territory of Wyoming to vote, may vote for such officer and on the constitution and separate propositions submitted, and no others, and said election shall be conducted and returns made and canvassed in the manner provided in the laws of said Territory for the election of the Delegate to Congress. At said election each qualified elector may have written or printed upon his ballot the words 'For the constitution' or 'Against the constitution,' and also the words 'For female suffrage' or 'Against female suffrage.' Also the words 'For eligibility of women to hold offices and sit on juries' or the words 'Against the eligibility of women to hold offices and sit on juries.' If at said election the majority of the legal votes cast shall be 'for the constitution,' the governor shall certify the result to the President of the United States, together with the votes cast thereon and upon separate articles or propositions, and a copy of said constitution, articles, and propositions. It shall be the duty of the President of the United States, if it shall appear that a majority of all the votes cast at said election were in favor of the constitution, to issue his proclamation announcing the result of such election, and thereupon said State of Wyoming shall be deemed admitted by Congress into the Union under and by virtue of this act, on an equal footing with the original States from and after the date of said proclamation: And provided further, That if it shall appear that a majority of the legal votes cast at said election were against female suffrage or against the eligibility of women to hold offices and sit on juries, then, in that event, the constitution of the said State of Wyoming shall be amended accordingly by virtue of such vote."

The question was taken on the adoption of the amendment; and the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were ordered.
The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 133, nays 139, not voting 57; as follows:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recorded.

Mr. POST. I wish to vote "no."

Mr. SPINOLA. I object.

The SPEAKER. There is no need for objection. Under the rule the Chair is not permitted to entertain the gentleman's request.

Mr. BAKER. I ask unanimous consent that the recapitulation of the names of members voting be dispensed with.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object.

The Clerk recapitulated the names.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. SPRINGER. I send the other amendment to the desk.

The Clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair observes that this amendment is not the one which was presented in print in the "Views of the minority."

Mr. SPRINGER. After consultation with the minority of the committee I have struck out one sentence.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

Several MEMBERS on the Republican side. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. Well, Mr. Speaker, there is a typographical error there in the number of a section, which I wish to have corrected.

Mr. BAKER. This is on a par with the rest of the opposition to the bill. I object to any change in the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman desires to change "section 7" to "section 6."

Several MEMBERS. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will read the amendment as it stands in the "Views of the minority."

Mr. SPRINGER. Well, I insist that that is a typographical error. The amendment should read "section 6," instead of "section 7," and I wish to have it corrected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has asked unanimous consent.

Mr. SPRINGER. It does not require unanimous consent to make it as it was written.

Mr. STRUBLE. I do not think that can be admitted, Mr. Speaker. For one, I object to it. Let the print stand as it is.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman can not object to the fact that in the printing of this amendment either the printer or some one else made a mistake and referred to the wrong section. I simply desire that the text shall be made to refer to the section which was actually proposed to be amended.

Mr. STRUBLE. I would have no objection to that, Mr. Speaker, if I had time to examine the amendment, but this has not been called to our attention, and I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. Well, I call it to the gentleman's attention now.

The SPEAKER. If the amendment is adopted, and upon examination this is found to be a mistake, it can be corrected. To correct it now would require unanimous consent, and objection is made. The Clerk will read the amendment as it stands in print.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Add to section 1 the following:

"Provided, That the State of Wyoming shall not be admitted into the Union until the proposed constitution thereof shall be amended as follows:

"First amendment: Strike out the first section of article 6, entitled 'Suffrage,' which section is in these words: 'The right of the citizens of the State of Wyoming to vote and hold office shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex. Both male and female citizens of this State shall equally enjoy all civil, political, and religious rights and privileges,' and insert in lieu thereof the following: 'SECTION 1. The rights of the citizens of the State of Wyoming to vote or hold office shall not be denied or abridged on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Both male and female citizens of this State shall equally enjoy all civil and religious rights and privileges.'

"Second amendment: Insert the word 'male' after the word 'every' and before the word 'citizen' in the first line of section 2, of article 6, so that the section will read:

"SEC. 2. Every male citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years and upward who has resided in the State or Territory one year and in the county wherein such residence is located sixty days next preceding any election shall be entitled to vote at such election, except as herein otherwise provided: And provided, That there shall be an election in the proposed State of Wyoming on the Tuesday next after the first Monday of November, 1890, for Representative in Congress for the Fifty-first and Fifty-second Congresses, for State, judicial, and legislative officers whose offices are created by the proposed constitution of the State of Wyoming, and for such county, precinct, and municipal officers as may be provided for under the said constitution of the State and under the laws of the Territory of Wyoming; but no county or township officers shall be elected unless their election would take place under the provisions of the laws of the Territory of Wyoming at that time. At said election electors who may be qualified to vote as provided in article 7 of said constitution as amended by this act shall be permitted to vote, and no other. And said election shall be conducted and returns made and canvassed in the manner provided in the laws of the Territory of Wyoming for the election of the Delegate in Congress from said Territory. At said election there may be written or printed on each ballot the words 'For the amended constitution' or the words 'Against the amended constitution.' And if the majority of the legal votes cast on this question shall be for the amended constitution then the governor of the Territory shall certify the result to the President of the United States together with a statement of the votes cast thereon and a certified copy of the amended constitution; and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States upon the receipt of such statement of votes cast and copy of such amended constitution, if it shall appear that said amended constitution has been ratified by a majority of the legal votes cast on that question, to issue his proclamation announcing the result of the election thereon; and thereupon the State of Wyoming shall be deemed admitted by Congress into the Union under and by virtue of this act on an equal footing with the original States from and after the date of such proclamation: And provided further, That no election shall be held in the Territory of Wyoming as provided in the ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth sections of the schedule of the proposed constitution of the State of Wyoming; but in lieu of such election there shall be an election in said Territory as provided in the foregoing provisions of this act."

The question was taken on agreeing to the amendment; and the Speaker declared that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 132, nays 138, not voting 59; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. HOPKINS with Mr. CARLISLE, for the rest of this day.

Mr. SHERMAN with Mr. COVERT, on this question.

Mr. BROWNE, of Virginia, with Mr. MAGNER.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BAKER. I ask unanimous consent to offer the amendment which I send to the desk, relating to the Yellowstone reservation. It has been submitted to our friends on the other side, and is, I believe, unobjectionable. It is intended to protect the rights of the United States in that reservation.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend section 1 by adding this proviso:

"Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall repeal or affect any act of Congress relating to the Yellowstone National Park, or the reservation of the park as now defined, or as may be hereafter defined or extended, or the power of the United States over it; and nothing contained in this act shall interfere with the right and ownership of the United States in said park and reservation as it now is or may hereafter be defined or extended by law; but exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, shall be exercised by the United States, which shall have exclusive control and jurisdiction over the same; and the said State shall not be entitled to select indemnity school lands for the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections that may be in said park reservation as the same is now defined or may be hereafter defined."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] asks unanimous consent to offer this amendment.

Mr. KILGORE. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman will not object. This bill puts the Yellowstone Park in the State of Wyoming.

Mr. KILGORE. Let the bill go back to the committee and I shall not object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman will not object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read the amendments proposed by the Committee on the Territories, as follows:

Amend section 2, line 3, by inserting, after the word "thereof," the following: "And the personal property of the United States now being in the Territory of Wyoming and which has been in use in the said Territory in the administration of the Territorial government, including books and records, and the property used at the constitutional convention which convened at Cheyenne in the month of September, 1890, are hereby granted and donated."

Also, insert in section 9, line 11, after the word "granted," the words "and donated."

Also, in section 11, line 16, after the word "institution," strike out the following:

"In Carbon County, 30,000 acres; for the penitentiary in Albany County, 30,000 acres; for the fish hatchery in Albany County, 10,000 acres; for the deaf, dumb, and blind asylum in Laramie County, 30,000 acres; for the poor-farm in Fremont County, 30,000 acres; for a miners' hospital, 30,000 acres; for normal schools, 100,000 acres; for State charitable, educational, penal, and reformatory institutions, 210,000 acres, making a total of 500,000 acres."

And insert the following:

"In course of construction in Carbon County, 30,000 acres; for the penitentiary in Albany County, 30,000 acres; for the fish hatchery in Albany County, 5,000 acres; for the deaf, dumb, and blind asylum in Laramie County, 30,000 acres; for the poor-farm in Fremont County, 10,000 acres; for a hospital for miners who shall become disabled or incapacitated to labor while working in the mines of the State, 30,000 acres; for public buildings at the capital of the State, in addition to those heretofore granted for that purpose, 75,000 acres; for State charitable, educational, penal, and reformatory institutions, 250,000 acres, making a total of 500,000 acres; Provided, That none of the lands granted by this act shall be sold for less than $10 per acre."

Also, in section 16, line 14, after the word "courts," insert "in the said district."

Also, in section 18, line 5, strike out "courts" and insert "court;" in same section, line 8, strike out "courts" and insert "court;" in same section, line 28, strike out "courts" and insert "court."

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendments. Mr. SPRINGER. There was an amendment which was agreed to by everybody, as I understood, but which was attached to the amendment which was objected to awhile ago; I mean the amendment relating to the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of land. The proviso appearing in the text refers to an act of Congress passed at the last session, which allows the State of Wyoming to have indemnity for lands in permanent reservations. The other four States that came in last year were not allowed to take lands equal to the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections.

Mr. BAKER. That is already provided for by law, and I must object.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is not provided for. The provision was attached to the amendment you offered and which was objected to.

Mr. BAKER. The amendment I offered covers the specific point desired.

Mr. SPRINGER. But it was objected to.

Mr. BAKER. The difficulty can be cured by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] withdrawing his objection. We can not consent to any change of the language at the point indicated by my friend from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. The provision which was objected to by the gentleman from Texas embraces control over the Yellowstone Park. It also relieves the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of that park from the school lands of Wyoming. If the bill passes in this shape the State of Wyoming will be allowed the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections in the Yellowstone Park, which is a public reservation. It will be allowed indemnity for the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections in this park and can locate them throughout the State. In the other States they were not allowed indemnity land in permanent reservations. They should be made equal in the four States. It was understood gentlemen would move an amendment in the land feature, to apply as in other bills.

Mr. KILGORE. I demand the regular order.

The committee amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill. Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Is it not in order now to move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Territories?

Mr. BAKER. After the order adopted by the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine the question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky to recommit the bill.

Mr. BAKER. I move to table that motion.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. BAKER. Is it not in order to move to lay it on the table?

The SPEAKER. The question can be taken as well on the motion itself.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is this the motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 129, nays 142, not voting 58; as follows:

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

Mr. OWENS, of Ohio. I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Upon what ground?

Mr. OWENS, of Ohio. I did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. The only proper ground is one where there is reason to suppose a gentleman's name was not called.

Mr. OWENS, of Ohio. The Chair has no reason to suppose I am not stating the fact.

The SPEAKER. Not at all. The gentleman did not hear his name called?

Mr. OWENS, of Ohio. That is the reason I have given.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman state he was in his seat at the time the roll was being called, was listening, and did not hear his name called?

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman says he did not hear his name called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must make his own statement, and the Chair will act on it.

Mr. OWENS, of Ohio. I was here on the second call, but I did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that is sufficient.

Mr. SPRINGER. That has been considered sufficient.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled upon this point repeatedly.

Mr. SPRINGER. Gentlemen on the other side have stated they were in the Hall and were allowed to vote.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will point to such an instance the Chair will be obliged.

Mr. SPRINGER. The RECORD will show it.

The SPEAKER. The RECORD will.

Mr. MORGAN. But, Mr. Speaker, it has been customary heretofore to ask gentlemen under such circumstances if they were listening for their names when they were called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been entirely impartial.

Mr. OWENS, of Ohio. I was listening and intending to vote, but did not hear my name.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman says that he comes within the rule—

Mr. OWENS, of Ohio. I was listening.

The SPEAKER. At the time when your name should have been called?

Mr. OWENS, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the name of the gentleman from Ohio.

The name of Mr. OWENS, of Ohio, was called and recorded as above.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. BERGEN with Mr. VENABLE, on the Wyoming question.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the names will be read.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. There has been so much confusion during the vote that the names ought to be recapitulated.

The Clerk read the names of those voting.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BAKER. In order now that my friends on the other side may have the opportunity to vote right once on this question, I ask the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill, on which the gentleman from New York demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 139, nays 127, not voting 63; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have my vote recorded.

The SPEAKER. On what grounds?

Mr. ENLOE. On the ground that I entered the Hall, specially to vote, during the call and before my name was reached. I was listening for it and did not hear it called.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman listening for his name at the time when it should have been called?

Mr. ENLOE. I was.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the name of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. ENLOE's name was called, and his vote recorded as above.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. WALLACE, of New York, with Mr. CAMPBELL.

Mr. RANDALL, of Massachusetts, with Mr. O'NEIL, of Massachusetts, for the rest of the day.

Mr. HOUK with Mr. PHELAN, on this vote.

Mr. BAKER. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask for the recapitulation of the votes.

The Clerk read the names of those voting.

The result of the vote was then announced as above.

Mr. BAKER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for a division of the motion. I ask for a separate vote on the motion to lay on the table. I desire to give the gentleman an opportunity of recording himself on that question.

Messrs. STRUBLE, BAKER, and others. Then let us have the yeas and nays.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. STRUBLE. I will not insist.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands a division of the question.

The question was taken on the motion to lay on the table; and on a division there were—yeas 110, nays 98.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let us have the yeas and nays on this.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAKER. I rise to a question of order. Is not this a dilatory motion? [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman made it himself; he ought to know. [Renewed laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 132, nays 120, not voting 77; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced the passage of the bill (H. R. 8458) authorizing the purchase of tents by the Secretary of War, and for other purposes, without amendment.

It also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which concurrence was requested:

A bill (S. 2942) making additional appropriation for the construction of a light-ship with steam fog-signal for the mouth of the Columbia; and

A bill (S. 3279) to suspend the enforcement of the act approved March 2, 1889, entitled "An act to amend sections 4488 and 4489 of the Revised Statutes, requiring life-saving appliances on steamers."

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills, with a view of taking up the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I find from looking at the RECORD that the Army appropriation bill was reported through the Clerk. I raise the point of order that it was not properly reported to the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I can not hear what the gentleman says.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order of the gentleman from Michigan is well taken; but the report can now be made and the bill will go to the committee.

Mr. BREWER. Do I understand that the report can be made now and then referred to the committee? It is not on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. It is not on the Calendar, but it will be as soon as it is reported.

Mr. BREWER. Strictly speaking, I apprehend it would not be under the rules.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Speaker, as the Chair has held that the point of order made by the gentleman from Michigan is well taken I desire to report the bill and ask for its immediate consideration. The bill was reported by handing it to the journal clerk at the desk.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that there is so much confusion in the Hall that we can not hear what is being said.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BREWER] makes the point of order that the Army appropriation bill, being a general appropriation bill, should have been reported to the House; and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] now makes the report to the House and it is referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DOCKERY. I reserve all points of order on that bill.

The SPEAKER. And all points of order will be reserved.

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that that was my only object in making the point, that I might have the privilege of reserving all points of order.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I am perfectly willing that all points of order shall be reserved.

The motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills, Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will now read.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the order was to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on this bill, but on general appropriation bills.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the appropriation bill H. R. 7619, being the bill to provide for the support of the Army.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The point I want to make is that it will require an order of the committee to take the bill up.

The CHAIRMAN. They will be taken up in their order unless the committee otherwise direct.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Does the other gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BREWER] give way with the fortifications bill?

Mr. BREWER. I have announced to the members of the committee that I shall ask to take up the fortifications bill on Saturday.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, this matter has as a matter of fact been upon the Calendar since—

Mr. CASWELL. Mr. Chairman, it is utterly impossible to hear what is going on.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] moves that the committee now take up for consideration House bill 7619, being the Army appropriation bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will now report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7619) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for other purposes.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the formal first reading of the bill may be dispensed with. I am not aware that there is any desire for general debate upon the bill. The bill is the ordinary routine bill for the support of the Army—

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I hope that we will have order.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the formal first reading of the bill; that we proceed to read it by paragraphs until we come to some part upon which gentlemen wish to debate, if there are any such paragraphs in the bill.

Mr. ROGERS. Pending that, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry, or rather an inquiry for information. I will ask the gentleman from Michigan whether there is any new legislation in the bill?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I think that there is nothing in the bill that can be called new legislation. There are some new appropriations. There is an appropriation for barracks and quarters that are beyond the appropriation of last year, but still it is for a recognized object. I think there is nothing that can be called new legislation.

Mr. ROGERS. I would be loath to ask to have the bill read; but in view of the fact that we do not know what is coming up until it comes, I think we had better have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed to read the bill.

The Clerk began to read.

Mr. LANSING (interrupting the reading). I wish to say to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs can point out the items that have what might be called new legislation in the bill. It is the ordinary appropriation bill as passed last year with a great many of the items just as they were last year, and the chairman of the committee can point out any changes made and would point them out. This is a very long bill and it is a mere formal matter to read it.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection has been made.

Mr. LANSING. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the objection.

Mr. ROGERS. I think we had better have the regular order.

Mr. BLOUNT. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] that this bill has just been reported to the House—

Mr. CUTCHEON. The bill as a matter of fact has been on the Calendar since the 27th day of February—

Mr. BLOUNT. I misunderstood the gentleman, then.

Mr. CUTCHEON. And the report has been in the document-room and accessible to all gentlemen since that time. The point was made simply to save all points of order upon the bill, the objection of the gentleman being to certain provisions in regard to field batteries.

Mr. ROGERS. I am not making this objection for any improper purpose. I simply want to know what is going on; and if the gentleman wants the committee to rise and let it go over until to-morrow, so that we may have an opportunity to read the bill, I shall not ask to have it read.

Mr. LODGE. Regular order.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is it not in order that general debate shall proceed?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not hear the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is it not in order that general debate proceed without the reading of the bill at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made, and the reading asked for. The Clerk will proceed.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not understand my friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] to object, provided that the general debate is taken up and that the bill is not to be considered by paragraphs at this time.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I ask that there may be order, so that I can hear what the gentleman is saying.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order and gentlemen cease conversation.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] has not objected to general debate proceeding with a view of understanding what the bill is; and he may not demand the reading of the bill if it does proceed. Therefore I suggest, simply with a view of facilitating matters, that perhaps, if the gentleman in charge of the bill would undertake at this time to explain its provisions, it may remove the occasion in the minds of any member to object and have the bill read.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his objection?

Mr. ROGERS. I have no objection if I have an opportunity to consider it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I will make a brief statement.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I object. I think we had better commence reading appropriation bills, if that is understood to be the rule.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. CANNON (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, it will take some time to finish the reading of this bill, and I understand that everybody is willing to consider the reading as completed and let the committee rise.

Mr. CUTCHEON. If the demand for the reading of the bill be withdrawn, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. McCREARY. If the demand for the reading of the bill has been withdrawn, I then suggest that the bill be printed in the RECORD, so that we can all read it there.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. McCREARY. Then let us go on with the reading.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. CUTCHEON (before the completion of the reading). Mr. Chairman, as the hour of 5 o'clock has arrived, and as there seems to be a general disposition not to go on further with this bill to-night, I will move that the committee now rise, simply stating that in Report 529, which can be had in the document-room, will be found a full tabulated statement of all the appropriations made in this bill compared with those made in the last Army appropriation bill, showing the increases and the decreases, which gentlemen can examine at their leisure. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7619) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] has an amendment which he proposes to offer when this bill comes up again for consideration, and which he desires unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD; and I move that the House do now adjourn, yielding to him simply to make that request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not move to adjourn conditionally. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] that his amendment be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. SPINOLA. I desire to have it read, reserving the right to object.

The amendment was read in part, as follows:

Page 17, line 4, after the word "dollars," insert: "Provided, That no alcoholic liquors, including beer and wine, shall be sold or supplied to the enlisted men in any canteen or in any room or building at any garrison."

Mr. SPINOLA. That is enough; I object. [Laughter.]

Mr. PICKLER. Let us have the amendment read through, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman can not interrupt the reading.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has the right to object. The request was for unanimous consent, and such a request does not give the right to have the matter read in full if objection is made.

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman from New York asked to have it read, and now I insist that it ought to be read in full for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that when a request is made for unanimous consent, as in this case, it is necessary to read more than enough to satisfy a gentleman that he wishes to object.

Mr. SPINOLA. I will give my friend plenty of time on this tomorrow. [Laughter.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. YARDLEY, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. WALLACE, of Massachusetts, until April 15, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

EXECUTIVE AND OTHER COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

SALARIES, ETC., IN OFFICE OF CIVIL-SERVICE COMMISSION.

Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication of the Civil-Service Commission submitting a supplemental estimate for salaries, etc., in the office of the Commission for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891—to the Committee on Appropriations.

ADDITIONAL SPACE FOR SUPERVISING ARCHITECT OF THE TREASURY.

Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, calling attention to the necessity of providing additional space for the engineering and draughting division of the office of the Supervising Architect, as recommended in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1889—to the Committee on Appropriations.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows, namely:

A bill (S. 2860) to authorize the construction of an addition to the public building at Houston, Tex., and to provide a cistern, heating apparatus, etc., for said building—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A bill (S. 3025) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to gather full and authentic information as to the present condition and preservation of the fur-seal interests of the Government in the region of Alaska, as compared with its condition in 1870; also full information as to the impending extinction of the sea-otter industry, and kindred lines of inquiry, etc.—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

A bill (S. 2942) making an additional appropriation for the construction of a light-ship, with steam fog-signal, for the mouth of the Columbia—to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. 3279) to suspend the enforcement of the act approved March 2, 1889, entitled "An act to amend sections 4488 and 4489 of the Revised Statutes, requiring life-saving appliances on steamers—to the Committee on Commerce.

A joint resolution (S. R. 46) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to remove the naval magazine from Ellis Island, in New York Harbor, and to purchase a site and erect a naval magazine at some other point—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

MEMORIALS AND RESOLUTIONS OF STATE LEGISLATURES.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, the following resolution was introduced and referred as follows:

By Mr. McRAE: Resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas, favoring a deep-water port on the Gulf of Mexico—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, the following resolution was introduced and referred as follows:

By Mr. DORSEY:

Resolved, That Thursday, March 27, immediately after the final vote on the bill for the admission of Wyoming, be set apart for consideration in the House of the bill for the admission of the Territory of Idaho, and that, unless previously ordered by the House, the previous question shall be deemed ordered on the engrossment, third reading, and final passage of the bill at 6 o'clock p. m. of that day; to the Committee on Rules.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk and disposed of as follows:

Mr. DORSEY, from the Committee on the Territories, reported favorably the bill of the House (H. R. 4562) to provide for the admission of the State of Idaho into the Union.

Mr. MANSUR, in behalf of the minority of said Committee on the Territories, submitted their views in writing thereon; and it was Ordered, That the said bill, together with the said views of the minority, be recommitted to the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the bill of the House (H. R. 3971) to make valid a deed to a certain tract of land in Bibb County, Georgia, made and delivered by Brig. Gen. Davis Tilson, acting assistant commissioner of the Freedman's Bureau, to Samuel L. Gustin, his heirs and assigns—to the House Calendar.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported with amendment the bill of the Senate (S. 221) providing for the erection of a public building at the city of Hastings, Nebr.—to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GIFFORD, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported with amendment the bill of the Senate (S. 1354) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Sioux Falls, in the State of South Dakota—to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. VAN SCHAICK, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported with amendment the following bills of the Senate; which were severally referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union:

A bill (S. 1453) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Saginaw, Mich.; and

A bill (S. 1285) to provide for the construction of a public building at Helena, Mont.

Mr. CLUNIE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported with amendment the bill of the Senate (S. 590) to provide for the construction of a public building in the city of Stockton, Cal.—to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on War Claims, reported with amendment the bill of the House (H. R. 3640) for the relief of the crew of the United States steamship Wyoming—to the Committee of the Whole House.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 27, 1890.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the Senate, a report of the Ordnance Board and an extract from the annual report of Maj. Gen. O. O. Howard to the Adjutant-General, in regard to certain tests at Sandy Hook of a new method of firing shells charged with nitro-glycerine from ordinary guns; which was read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The communication will lie on the table until the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], who offered the resolution to which this is a response, comes into the Chamber.

Mr. COCKRELL subsequently said: I move that the communication and accompanying papers from the Secretary of War laid before the Senate this morning during my absence in the Committee on Appropriations be ordered to be printed and lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a communication from John C. Gates, secretary of District Assembly No. 66, Knights of Labor, Washington, D. C., inclosing resolutions favoring the enforcement of the eight-hour law; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of Subordinate Union No. 2 of the Bricklayers and Masons' International Union of America, of Norfolk, Va., praying that none but American citizens be employed on Government works; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a communication from C. Burton Lyon, making certain suggestions in regard to the proposed world's fair; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Quadro-Centennial.

Mr. SQUIRE presented a memorial of the Legislature of Washington; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, STATE OF WASHINGTON,
Office of the Secretary of State.

I, Allen Weir, secretary of state of the State of Washington and custodian of the seal of said State, do hereby certify that I have carefully compared the attached instrument of writing, i. e., Senate memorial No. 10, relative to light-house in San Juan Passage, with the original now on file in my office, and that the same is a correct transcript therefrom and of the whole of said original.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said State, at Olympia, this 17th day of February, A. D. 1890.

[SEAL.] ALLEN WEIR, Secretary of State.

[Senate memorial No. 10.]

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the senate and house of representatives of the State of Washington, in legislative session assembled, would respectfully represent to your honorable body that the commerce of Puget Sound carried on by steam and sailing vessels in and through the San Juan Archipelago is large and growing, as attested by daily and triweekly mail and passenger routes in constant operation; by an immense business in transporting lime, lime-rock, building-stone, lumber, fruit, wool, dairy and farm products, and other merchantable commodities too numerous to mention; that the shores of navigable channels through said islands are for the most part bold, rocky, and perilous; that said channels are for the most part narrow, tortuous, and difficult to navigate, particularly in foggy or cloudy weather, or in dark nights; that the channel known as "San Juan Passage" is particularly hazardous and is an urgent subject for aids and improvements to navigation therein, being the channel most used. Wherefore your memorialists would earnestly request that an appropriation of at least $50,000 be made from the national Treasury to erect a light-house at a suitable point at the mouth, or southern termination, of said San Juan Passage. And your memorialists will ever pray.

Passed the senate January 7, 1890.

CHAS. E. LAUGHTON,
President of the Senate.

Passed the house January 8, 1890.

J. W. FEIGHAN,
Speaker of the House.

Mr. GORMAN presented the petition of John Kane and William B. Nolan, president and secretary of Subordinate Union No. 3, Bricklayers and Masons' International Union of America, of Baltimore, Md., praying that none but American citizens be employed on public works; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. REAGAN presented three petitions of citizens of Wichita County, Texas, praying that an appropriation be made for a public building at Wichita Falls, Wichita County, Texas; which were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. DANIEL presented a memorial of J. C. Kelly and other citizens of Charlottesville, Va., remonstrating against the advancing to 2 cents per pound of the duty on tin-plate; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALLEN presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Washington; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, STATE OF WASHINGTON,
Office of the Secretary of State.

I, Allen Weir, secretary of state of the State of Washington and custodian of the seal of said State, do hereby certify that I have carefully compared the attached instrument of writing, i. e., house memorial No. 9, in relation to the Puyallup Indian reservation, with the original now on file in my office, and that the same is a correct transcript therefrom and of the whole of said original.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said State, at Olympia, this 17th day of February, A. D. 1890.

[SEAL.] ALLEN WEIR, Secretary of State.

Memorial.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America: Your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Washington, respectfully represent:

That what is known as the Puyallup reservation lies directly in front of the city of Tacoma, a city of 30,000 people, and forms a barrier extending the width of the Puyallup Valley, while beyond the narrow strip of land it embraces lie the extensive and fertile valleys of the Puyallup, Stuck, White, and Green Rivers, becoming a thickly settled country, in which numerous industries are springing into life, necessitating direct, easy, and rapid transit with Tacoma and Seattle.

That there has been organized and incorporated under the laws of the State of Washington a railway corporation known as "The Washington Street Railway, Water, Light, and Construction Company," at Puyallup, Wash., which company hereby respectfully asks of your honorable body the privilege of a right of way through the aforementioned Puyallup reservation.

That the construction of the above-mentioned line of railway will materially aid in the development and progress of the country lying beyond said reservation; said road would run through a fertile region of country that is being rapidly settled by a hardy, industrious, and intelligent class of farmers, but they are sadly deficient in the means of ingress and egress consequent upon the obstruction of said Puyallup reservation.

And, whereas the commercial, financial, agricultural, and social interests of 300,000 people of the cities of Tacoma and Seattle and contiguous country require the immediate granting of the right of way to the above-named railway; and

Whereas the consent of seven-eighths of the Indian council of said Puyallup reservation has been honestly obtained, provided that for the land so taken just compensation would be made; and

Whereas the lands on said reservation over which the line of said railway would be located have been allotted in severalty and a patent issued to each Indian on the 30th day of January, A. D. 1886, for the land selected by him, granting the same to him in fee-simple, with a stipulation restricting alienation until such restriction is removed by the State Legislature, with the consent of Congress; and

Whereas a majority of said Indians of said reservation, and through their council, are most anxious to have railroads as soon as possible upon and across their reservation, believing that thereby their holdings must be greatly enhanced in value; and

Whereas it has ever been the practice of the National Legislature to dispense its favors where the greatest benefits shall be conferred on the greatest number, [and] will now, we trust, grant the prayer of this memorial for the speedy accomplishment of this important enterprise, the necessity of which every citizen acquainted with the growing commercial and manufacturing importance of the city of Tacoma and the vast agricultural resources of the section of country over which the proposed railway will be built must at once acknowledge that it is a subject-matter of absorbing importance:

We therefore, your memorialists, most earnestly and respectfully ask your honorable body, to regard with favor and grant the prayer of this memorial; as in duty bound we will ever pray.

Passed the house December 18, 1889.

J. W. FEIGHAN, Speaker.

Passed the senate January 13, 1890.

CHAS. E. LAUGHTON, President.

Mr. ALLEN. I present a petition signed by 160 citizens of the State of Washington, setting forth that in its present condition Lewis River is unnavigable for a number of months each year, on account of which a large farming community is prevented from shipping products to market; that the amount of steam-boat traffic is constantly increasing upon Lewis River; that by an expenditure of not to exceed $25,000 that river may be made navigable throughout the year. The petitioners state that the improvements needed are the construction of dams and the removal of snags from the river, and they pray that Congress will make such appropriation. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON presented a petition of citizens of Grand Island, Nebr., praying for the passage of the international copyright bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Bricklayers and Masons' International Union of Grand Island, Nebr., praying for legislation to prevent the employment of aliens on Government work; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BLAIR presented a petition of 208 citizens of Beaver County, Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of a Sunday-rest law; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. McPHERSON presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of New Jersey, favoring the passage of Senate bill 305, to transfer the revenue marine to the naval establishment; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of subordinate unions of the Bricklayers and Masons' International Union of America, of Jersey City, Mont Clair, Paterson, Newark, Orange, Plainfield, and New Brunswick, in the State of New Jersey, praying that the laws be so amended as to provide that none but citizens of the United States shall be employed on all Government works, whether let by contract or otherwise; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3174) constituting Cairo, Ill., a port of delivery in the customs collection district of New Orleans, reported it without amendment.

A bill (S. 1518) for the relief of Orin R. McDaniel.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2400) directing the Secretary of War to provide two captured cannon for the use of the Crippled Union Soldiers' Association, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

EXPENSES OF CENSUS AGENTS.

Mr. HALE. By direction of the Committee on the Census, I report without amendment the bill (H. R. 7025) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for taking the eleventh and subsequent censuses."

approved March 1, 1889, and I ask for its present consideration and passage, as it relates to the work of the Census Office.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 18 of an act entitled "An act to provide for taking the eleventh and subsequent censuses," approved March 1, 1889, be amended by adding to the last line of said section 18, after the words "and actual necessary traveling expenses," the words "and a per diem allowance in lieu of subsistence of $3 per day."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from Maine explain the bill?

Mr. HALE. The Census Office finds that in dealing with its numerous agents, a large army, the work is hindered and the accounts are suspended for the reason that, if the special agents are obliged to present itemized accounts of every item of subsistence, in many cases there will be little items that give rise to doubt, and, while the amount of the bill is always as large as that here provided it needs an army of clerks to supervise and look over and audit the accounts. It will save much labor, time, and expense in the office if the amount of $3 per day is substituted, as has been done heretofore by Congress in the case of pension agents and land agents and special inspectors of the Interior Department. In the end it will add nothing to the expense, for the accounts that come in are all up, and this allows a substitution of so much instead of the itemized accounts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask whether this provision of $3 a day includes expenses of travel?

Mr. HALE. It does not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So that the $3 a day is only for subsistence purely, and the traveling accounts will have to be reported and audited as now provided by law?

Mr. HALE. The traveling accounts can not be commuted, for the reason that they vary so largely upon different routes and by different methods of transportation; but subsistence can be commuted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Are there amendments to the bill as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask one more question, if I may. Does this allowance for subsistence cover the time when an agent of the Census Bureau is living at home?

Mr. HALE. It does not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is carefully excluded?

Mr. HALE. It only covers the time when he is traveling.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PLATT. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill, in order that I may have a few moments to examine one matter in relation to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

TENTS FOR FLOOD SUFFERERS.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Committee on Military Affairs instruct me to report back favorably the bill (H. R. 8458) authorizing the purchase of tents by the Secretary of War, and for other purposes, and to ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read for information, subject to objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information. The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to purchase twenty-five hundred tents, or so many thereof as may be necessary, for the use of the people driven from their homes in the States of Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana by the present floods prevailing in said States.

Sec. 2. That said tents shall be loaned to the authorities of said States for the purposes aforesaid, at the discretion of the Secretary of War.

Sec. 3. That $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay for the said tents herein authorized to be purchased; and this appropriation shall be available upon the passage of this act.

Mr. HAWLEY. It will be seen that the bill does not direct the Secretary of War to purchase or direct him to loan tents. It gives him authority to do so if it may seem to be necessary. There is undoubtedly a considerable degree of suffering in the States named. We have been from year to year on various occasions asked to loan tents for different purposes, but the War Department only keeps on hand the supply necessary for the ordinary uses of the Army, and would be unable, even if we authorized it, to loan tents. The bill authorizes the Secretary of War, if it may seem necessary, to buy a certain number and to loan them under such restrictions as may seem best to him in cases of necessity. The committee instructed me to ask for immediate consideration, because if the bill is to be of any service now it ought to be promptly passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not object to the present consideration of the bill, for it is apparently a very worthy one, to provide means out of the Treasury of the United States in cash to help people who are in distress—in extreme, immediate distress; and I am willing that the people whom I more directly represent shall contribute the necessary part of the $25,000 for that charity. But I want to call the attention of Senators who have been greatly troubled about the Constitution lately in respect of appropriating money for objects not specifically named in the Constitution to it, so that they will vote advisedly and, I hope, in favor of the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I accept so much of that reference as pertains to myself with very great pleasure. We have abundant precedent for this action. I consider this, and not the Blair bill, as coming legitimately within the expression "general welfare." There have been one, two, three, four, five, six cases in which Congress has done something of this kind. I hold the acts in my hand.

Mr. REAGAN. In reply to the Senator from Vermont, I wish to inquire what part of the State-rights floods are drowning people here.

Mr. HAWLEY. I can not hear the Senator.

Mr. REAGAN. I was referring to what the Senator from Vermont said, and was inquiring what part of the State-right floods are drowning people here.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I wish to say that, although my State is the first one named in the bill, I have not received any information either from the governor of Arkansas or any of the citizens there showing that the necessity existed for the relief provided for. The bill, I think, was introduced in the other House by a Representative from Louisiana. One of my colleagues in the other House, Judge ROGERS, made the same statement there that I make here, that he had received no complaint from the State of Arkansas in regard to the suffering of people there which would require this relief. He stated, however, that he did not represent the district lying immediately along the Mississippi River in the Mississippi Valley; that that district was represented by a gentleman whom a majority of the House of Representatives had recently declared was entitled to a seat there, contrary to the opinion of the rest of the delegation from Arkansas. Judge ROGERS called upon him [Mr. FEATHERSTON] to state whether the citizens of his district needed this relief. He made no response to that request of the member, Judge ROGERS.

Therefore, I do not know whether there is real distress in Arkansas or not. I know that there has been quite an overflow there which has flooded a portion of my State. I do not wish to stand in the way of any relief that is proposed to any people there who may need it, but I state again that I have had no complaint from the authorities of the State or any other citizens of the State showing that this relief is required.

Mr. WALTHALL. Mr. President, it is perhaps due that I should state to the Senate what I stated to the committee.

So far as I am informed, sir, there has been no application made by or on behalf of the authorities of Mississippi for the relief proposed by the bill. I understand from the author of the bill that Arkansas and Mississippi were included along with Louisiana because it was anticipated that if the flood continued the needs of those two States might possibly become as great as the present needs of Louisiana, which is the principal sufferer from the flood. The statement made by the author of the bill is this:

The bill has been drawn for a much larger number of tents than is required to provide for this particular case, because we anticipated that there might be needs of the same kind at other points on the Mississippi, in the State of Arkansas, and at other places. It was not expected, however, that the Secretary of War would purchase more tents with the appropriation proposed than would be actually necessary to meet the difficulties of the present situation, but that he should have enough funds to meet any demand that might be made upon him to supply these homeless people.

I deemed it proper to make this statement.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. President, after the statements which have been made here by several gentlemen I think it proper I should say that, while I have received no intimation of any need for tents, yesterday morning a telegram came to Major BRECKINRIDGE, a member of the other House from Arkansas, addressed to Major BRECKINRIDGE and to me, stating that there was a large number of colored people in Monroe County, Arkansas, who were driven from their homes by the flood and who needed assistance, who needed rations, and that there ought to be some sort of provision made to take care of those people.

I believe that Congress has usually, on the occasions when there was very great distress by reason of a great flood, provided supplies for certain suffering people; but, as this telegram came from an isolated spot and does not seem to be general in any way, Major BRECKINRIDGE and I thought it unnecessary to attempt to have any relief sent to those people, at least for the present, even if Congress should undertake the task, as done heretofore, of taking care of those who are suffering from overflows by issuing to them rations.

I have heard no request for tents. I do not know of any necessity for any; and I am inclined to think that if any such necessity exists it must be to a very limited extent.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, this bill passed the other House while I was absent from the city of Washington. It was brought to the attention of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate this morning and was favorably reported from that committee. It does not direct the Secretary of War to furnish tents. It merely authorizes the Secretary of War, if in his judgment there should be necessity in any part of the Mississippi Valley for tents, to loan them to the State authorities temporarily for the use of the people who may be driven from their homes.

I have received a large number of dispatches from persons in authority in the overflowed district saying that there were great numbers of colored people who had been driven from their homes and were on the ridges which were not overflowed, and that in their judgment tents should be furnished them. I dispatched to the governor of Louisiana on the subject and he replied that he had sent some tents to the authorities in the overflowed district. I have misplaced the dispatches between us, but will find them and insert them in my remarks.

It is not a matter of charity. The Legislatures of these States are not in session. The authorities have no means by which they can buy tents, no appropriations for that purpose having been made. I am informed that about the 1st of July, under an act of Congress, there will be a certain amount of money going to each State under the militia act; and I can assure the Senate that all the tents that may be required in the State of Louisiana by the authorities there for these people who have been driven from their homes, and which may be furnished now, will be deducted from the number that will come to that State under the act of Congress on or about the 1st of July.

I trust under the circumstances that the bill will meet with no opposition. It has already passed the other House.

The dispatches referred to by Mr. GIBSON are as follows:

To Governor F. T. NICHOLLS, New Orleans, La.:
Are any of our people in such distress as requires legislation to procure tents?
Have you not already supplied them?
R. L. GIBSON.

To Hon. R. L. GIBSON:
I have sent fifty tents to Colonel Sharp, member of the fifth levee board. He is at Tallulah. He telegraphed me to send all I could, but without details of the situation. I have about fifty more, which I will hold for calls at some other point or points. Colonel Sharp can be reached by telegraph. I telegraphed Robertson several days ago to have impressed upon any resolution which might be passed anticipating turning over to me of Louisiana July quota for militia the right to use tents for overflowed people. I do not know the extent they may be needed. BOATNER must be in direct communication with the district most overflowed.
F. T. NICHOLLS.

To Hon. J. C. BOATNER, Washington, D. C.:
Yes. The necessity for tents is very urgent.
GEO. C. WADDILL.

To Senator R. L. GIBSON:
The necessity for tents is very great. Secure necessary appropriation.
H. S. COLTHORP.

Mr. HAWLEY. Allow me to put upon record, as a matter of convenience, this statement:

Tents were loaned in 1879-'80 to the yellow-fever sufferers of Memphis; in 1881 to the sufferers by tornado in Missouri; in 1882 to the sufferers by flood in Mississippi; in 1884 to similar sufferers along the Ohio River; in 1887 to the sufferers by earthquake in Charleston; in 1888 to sufferers by fire in Seattle and Spokane, Washington Territory.

All the tents in those cases have been returned except those loaned to Charleston, which were given finally to the State of South Carolina. I should have no objection to an amendment of the bill if it were not that it would require that the measures shall go back to the other House, and if anything is to be done it should be done to-day.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I have habitually voted against all bills of this character and am opposed to this one. However, I will not consume the time of the Senate by asking for the yeas and nays, but shall content myself by simply declaring and putting on record my opposition to the bill.

Mr. BATE. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Louisiana if the governor of Louisiana has asked for this relief in his official capacity.

Mr. GIBSON. I read before the Committee on Military Affairs the telegram I received in reply to my dispatch to the governor of Louisiana, but it seems to have been mislaid. I think I must have left it in the committee-room.

Mr. BATE. I ask the Senator to state the substance of it, so that we may know whether the governor has asked for the passage of this bill.

Mr. GIBSON. The substance of the dispatch was that he had furnished the people fifty tents in that particular locality. I think that he had some still in reserve for other points that might be overflowed, and he said he would refer me to the local authorities to ascertain the extent of the suffering and the disaster there. I then telegraphed, and I received dispatches from the local authorities, and on those dispatches the committee acted this morning.

Mr. BATE. I do not yet receive a direct answer to my question. As I understand it, the governor of Louisiana has not asked directly for this measure of relief.

Mr. GIBSON. I do not know whether he asked directly for it or not, because this legislation was pending before the Committee on Military Affairs on my arrival in the city, having been absent; but I suppose the bill passed the other House on some recommendation of the governor. At all events it is before us on the application of many leading citizens in that part of the State, who are witnesses of the distress and suffering of the people and upon whose judgment the governor would be obliged to rely if there were any occasion for his intervention. He telegraphed me that he has done all he could for the sufferers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIGHT-SHIPS FOR COLUMBIA RIVER.

Mr. DOLPH. By direction of the Committee on Commerce I report favorably the bill (S. 2942) making an additional appropriation for the construction of a light-ship, with steam fog-signal, for the mouth of the Columbia. The bill consists of less than five lines, and I ask for its present consideration. It will take but a minute.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $10,000 additional or the construction of a light-ship, with steam fog-signal, to mark the bar at the mouth of the Columbia River, Oregon.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIFE-SAVING APPLIANCES.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (S. 3279) to suspend the enforcement of the act approved March 2, 1880, entitled "An act to amend sections 4483 and 4489 of the Revised Statutes, requiring life-saving appliances on steamers," which was read twice by its title.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Having been read twice, the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, not yet. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to ask for present action on the bill.

Instructed by the committee, I reported some two or three weeks ago a bill repealing the law which required steamers to carry certain classes of projectiles. That report was made on information received from the Treasury Department, and which seemed to be conclusive; but the bill has gone upon the Calendar, has attracted the attention of the people interested, and I have received such information since the report as to leave me in doubt as to the propriety of passing that bill. The committee, on reference of the matter to them this morning, had the same doubts. I would not dare to ask the Senate to pass the bill formerly reported until a hearing shall have been had before the committee.

But all the lake steamers are to be inspected the next month, and the Secretary of the Treasury this month has issued his circular requiring them to be inspected and the inspector to find that they have provided themselves with these projectiles. They can not be permitted to enter into business unless they have that certificate from the inspector. It would cost them some $60,000 probably, and the law may be repealed at this very session of Congress. Therefore, it seemed to me entirely proper that a bill should be passed suspending for a year the act requiring the projectiles, thus relieving lake steamers from the necessity of obtaining these projectiles within the next thirty days and enabling them to be permitted to engage in their business. The committee agrees, and unanimously authorizes me to report this bill and ask immediate action, because the inspectors have just received their instructions to require those projectiles in the inspection. I hope the Senate will consent that the bill may be passed at once.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I feel it my duty to object. Let it go over until to-morrow. I shall have no objection to its being taken up then.

Mr. FRYE. Why not this morning? The steam-boat men on the entire lakes are sending in their requests for this.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will agree, if there can be a vote without debate and no time consumed.

Mr. FRYE. It will take no time at all. I have simply stated the facts.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then let it be taken up, subject to objection.

Mr. McPHERSON. What is the request the Senator from Maine has made?

Mr. FRYE. The bill is simply to suspend for one year the provision of last year which required all steamers to provide themselves with projectiles or cannon.

Mr. McPHERSON. What is the object?

Mr. FRYE. As the law has just come into force and the Treasury regulations have just been made requiring inspectors to find that steamers have these projectiles, and the lake steamers are about being inspected, the object is to relieve them at this present time from that requirement until Congress shall determine whether the bill reported the other week from the committee shall become a law.

Mr. McPHERSON. Then it leaves them, as I understand it, without the appliances for a year?

Mr. FRYE. For a year.

Mr. McPHERSON. The question I asked the Senator from Maine was the particular object in view in relieving them from that necessity.

Mr. FRYE. The Committee on Commerce reported a bill the other week repealing the law requiring projectiles, and it is on the Calendar. Since that bill has been reported the committee have come to be in doubt in relation to the propriety of passing that bill, and hearings are desired before the committee by various parties in the country, humanitarians and ship men, etc., and yet these lake vessels must be inspected within thirty days in order to engage in their business. This is simply to relieve them.

Mr. McPHERSON. It seems to me to be a very extraordinary proceeding to relieve the merchant vessels of this country from the necessity of carrying appliances for the saving of life.

Mr. FRYE. Why, sir, this is simply a projectile, which they never were required to carry by law up to the present time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. FRYE. The Treasury Department has just issued its circular. It applies to only one kind of projectile.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection if there is to be no debate. By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of an act to amend sections 4488 and 4489 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, requiring line-carrying projectiles and the means of propelling them to be carried on steamers, and the rules and regulations relating thereto, adopted by the board of supervising inspectors and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury March 2, 1890, be, and they are hereby, suspended from operation and enforcement for the period of one year.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARGARET KENNEDY.

Mr. PASCO. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill (S. 1618) for the relief of Margaret Kennedy was indefinitely postponed yesterday be reconsidered, and that the bill be put upon the Calendar with the adverse report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McPHERSON introduced a bill (S. 3281) to increase the pension of Abbie L. Tucker; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FARWELL introduced a bill (S. 3282) for the erection of a public building at Rock Island, Ill.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MOODY introduced a bill (S. 3283) for the relief of Margaret E. Devine; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SQUIRE introduced a bill (S. 3284) for the relief of Thomas Wright; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 3285) for the establishment of a national laboratory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a bill (S. 3286) for the relief of Georgine Campbell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3287) for the relief of Emma C. Lovelace and Stephen D. Clark; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3288) for the relief of the estate of Odon Deucatte; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DANIEL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3289) making appropriation for payment of a claim found by the Court of Claims to be due to the estate of Anthony R. Fraser, deceased, late of Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3290) to extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims to all claims for the use by the Government of patents granted by the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 3291) granting a pension to Joseph W. Ard; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 3292) to secure the safety of freight cars employed in interstate commerce by the use of proper couplers, freight-train brakes, and other appliances prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

HOOR OF MEETING.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. EDMUNDS was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to; as follows:

Ordered, That on and after Monday next, March 31, the daily sessions of the Senate shall commence at 11 o'clock a. m. until otherwise ordered.

TRUSTS AND COMBINATIONS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, Senate bill No. 1.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1) to declare unlawful trusts and combinations in restraint of trade and production.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the vote on the amendments be taken separately. They can be disposed of rapidly in that way.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first amendment will be read.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is not in order until the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole are acted on.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments will be stated in their order.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first reserved amendment is, in line 4 of section 1, to strike out "citizens" and insert "persons;" so as to read:

Two or more persons or corporations.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I do not think that was the first amendment made in Committee of the Whole, and I desire to say that this bill as printed does not indicate the amendments as made in Committee of the Whole at all. It indicates that after certain amendments had been made in Committee of the Whole they are taken as agreed to and that certain other amendments made after that are a part of the bill. For instance, that portion of the first section of the bill that is not printed in italics is not at all or, if at all, is not the same as was reported to the Senate by the Senator from Ohio, but represents the bill reported by the Senator from Ohio after certain amendments had been made to it.

The matter to which I allude may perhaps be better illustrated by turning to section 6, where the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas commences. There is nothing in the printed bill to show that sections 6 or 7 or 8 or 9 or 10 and the subsequent sections came into this bill in Committee of the Whole by amendment, but the only things which are indicated as amendments are certain amendments to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, like the word "eight" in line 7 of section 6, the words "or producer, or lawful agent of such owner or producer," in lines 9 and 10 of section 7, and the words "and also stocks and bonds" in line 8.

Now, we are not going to act on the amendments as made in Committee of the Whole if we follow this bill as the amendments are indicated in the print of the bill. I only want to get at the matter in proper form.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment which has been read.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Connecticut will allow me to suggest that this is the second reprint of this bill. The first print of the bill and amendments made up to that time was printed without indicating what was the original bill and what the amendments. The Senator is quite right in saying that the bill as now printed does not indicate as amendments anything but minor amendments to the principal amendments that have been made to the bill. The clerks at the desk can not indicate every amendment that has been made, no one of which has yet been considered by the Senate, and the amendments must be called in their order under the order of the Senate of yesterday and a separate vote taken upon each. We shall have to rely not upon this print as to what are amendments and what are not made in Committee of the Whole, but upon the report from the Secretary's desk. The clerks can indicate every amendment that was agreed to in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLATT. To show further what I mean and what I was trying to call attention to, let me refer to the fourth line, where the word "citizens" appears in this bill to be stricken out and "persons" inserted. That was about to be reported as the first amendment made in Committee of the Whole; but that amendment was made because there had been stricken out of the bill as originally reported in the first section these words: "of different States or between two or more citizens or corporations, or both, of the United States and foreign states, or citizens or corporations thereof." The striking out of those words in the bill as reported led to the amendment, which the Chief Clerk was about to report, of striking out "citizens" and inserting "persons." Therefore that amendment is clearly not in order unless the amendment is agreed to which had been previously made by striking out three lines in section 1.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I should be glad to know in some way the exact parliamentary situation of this bill, so that we may see where we are to begin.

This bill, as I understand it, was introduced early in the session by the Senator from Ohio. It was referred to the Committee on Finance, and soon afterwards reported back with one or two amendments. That bill then consisted of three sections. Later on in the discussion the Finance Committee reported a substitute for the original bill, consisting of two sections.

Mr. PLATT. That was treated as the original bill.

Mr. ALLISON. That is what I want to understand.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was done by unanimous consent.

Mr. ALLISON. So I was about to say.

Mr. HARRIS. Allow me to suggest that the Journal shows that that substitute reported by the committee is journalized now as the original bill, and the real original is lost sight of entirely.

Mr. ALLISON. So I understand. The original bill introduced by the Senator from Ohio and the original bill reported back by the Finance Committee have both disappeared, and in lieu of them what have we? The original bill as last reported consisted of two sections. Am I right in that?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. The original bill consisted of two sections. Now, everything else in this printed bill except those two sections consists of amendments to this bill in all shades and degrees.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly, and a separate vote must be taken on the various amendments.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; but now, as I understand, at the Secretary's desk the clerks are proposing to treat these amendments as they appear in this print.

Mr. SHERMAN. The only mistake the clerks made—and it was a very small mistake—was this: There was one amendment made which does not appear in this print, and the only one that I know of. If the Senator from Connecticut can find any other he may point it out. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] moved to strike out three lines of the bill specifying combinations made by citizens of different States. That language was put in by the Committee on Finance, and was not in the original bill. He moved to strike it out and it was stricken out. That amendment does not appear on the face of the printed bill, but it will be reported, as a matter of course, by the Chief Clerk in reading the amendments in their order as they are noted in the copy of the bill before him.

Mr. ALLISON. What I fear is that by proceeding to treat these amendments in the manner and order indicated here by taking, for example, the first amendment stated, which is, striking out "citizens" and inserting "persons," we shall get into confusion. That is not the first amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is the first amendment in the bill.

Mr. PLATT. No.

Mr. SHERMAN. We do not take them in point of time as they were offered, but as they occur in the bill. In the order of place the word "persons" occurs before the line that was stricken out.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; but that is the very point I make. That is not the first amendment. The first amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, which does not appear on the face of this print at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. That comes afterwards. We go not in point of time of the adoption of the amendment, but in the point of place in the bill where they occur.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is right.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand, the words that the Senator from Massachusetts proposed to strike out are words right in connection with the amendment which we are now asked to consider.

Mr. SHERMAN. After the word "persons."

Mr. ALLISON. I shall be glad to have that amendment reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

Mr. ALLISON. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts which was agreed to in the first section.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 5, after the word "both," the words "of different States or between two or more citizens or corporations, or both, of the United States and foreign states, or citizens or corporations thereof" were stricken out in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, that does not reach what I was suggesting. I want an opportunity to vote on the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will have that opportunity.

Mr. PLATT. It does not appear here to be an amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Journal will show it.

Mr. PLATT. And also I want an opportunity to vote on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

Mr. SHERMAN. That the Senator will have.

Mr. PLATT. So that I can have these opportunities I make no objection, but they can not be found by an examination of this bill as now printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, it does not appear to me that there is any difficulty at all about this business practically, although the form of the print, to people who have not followed it all through, might be a little misleading. But if it were misleading in the mere sense of what has been agreed to and what has not, the bill is now for the first time reported back to the Senate from the Committee of the Whole. Every part of this whole thing, text and amendments—it does not make the least difference which—is open to motions to strike out, and insert, and every other allowable motion. Therefore no Senator can be gotten into a trap, as it might be called, or be misled in respect of losing any right to propose to change the bill, to leave something out or put something in anywhere in it from top to bottom; and the Senator from Ohio is entirely right in saying that these amendments, when they are reported from the Committee of the Whole, must be taken in the order in which they stand in the bill, and not in the order in which they may happen to have been moved at the beginning.

So, then, there is not any practical difficulty about going on, and everybody can vote "yes" or "no," as he likes, on every single line or word that there is in the whole print, from beginning to end, and nothing whatever is concluded.

While I am up I wish to say—I see my friend from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] is not here, but I will say it, nevertheless—that what I said yesterday in respect of the bill introduced by my friend from Texas [Mr. COKE] was said three or four days ago in respect to its reference to a subcommittee. I find that I was in error with regard to the time of that reference. I think I said three or four days ago that the bill was very soon after its introduction referred to a subcommittee. On looking at the records of the committee I find that it was not referred to a subcommittee until the 10th day of February, but it is due to the committee and the Senator himself to say also that before that time, owing to the press of executive business and the illness of the chairman, no references at all were made except two before that time, and those were of important local matters in the northwestern part of the United States that were referred to subcommittees earlier than this reference; but, owing to the pressure that I stated upon the whole committee about executive matters, those subcommittees have not yet been able to report on the matters which were previously referred to them. So that there was no ground for supposing and I did not intend to intimate that the Senator from Kansas had been in the slightest degree derelict. I only thought that what he said reflected upon himself as one member of the committee, and so upon all the rest of us, as not having been diligent in endeavoring to attend to the business the Senate had committed to us. But it is due to him to say that in every respect he has been one of the most faithful and diligent of the members of that committee, and I say it most gladly.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I have no desire to embarrass the Senate in its action upon this bill; but may I inquire of the Senator from Vermont as to what he understands the order of the Senate to be in relation to voting upon these amendments? For instance, when we come to section 6, all the sections, including section 6 and after that, are parts of an amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas. But there were certain amendments to that amendment made which are indicated in italics. Now, when we come to section 6 and the subsequent sections, which were proposed by the Senator from Kansas as an amendment, what are we to consider? Are we to consider the sections as amended, or are we to consider amendments to the amendment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is perfectly clear, I think, with great respect to my friend from Connecticut.

Mr. PLATT. I ask for information purely.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is perfectly clear that where an amendment is proposed by a Senator in Committee of the Whole, and that amendment is amended and then agreed to, it becomes one single amendment, and we can not go back into the various amendments to amendments which were made in Committee of the Whole and take each one by itself, but everything is open, and if anything has got into the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, for illustration, that any Senator thinks ought not to be there, all he has to do is to move to strike it out.

Mr. PLATT. After it has been agreed to or before?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before; while it is pending. So at this present moment, I repeat, there is no single line in this bill from beginning to end which it is not open to any Senator to call the attention of the Senate to and take their opinion upon.

Mr. HARRIS. I want to ask the Senator from Vermont if in his opinion the easiest solution of this trouble, so far as it is a trouble, would not be found in the suggestion that I understood him as making to me privately a few minutes ago, that we abandon the consideration of the amendments, and by unanimous consent treat this bill in the Senate as an original bill subject to amendment in any form that a majority of the Senate may choose?

Mr. SHERMAN. I should have to object to that, because I want a vote—like the Senator from Connecticut—on these amendments. The simple, orderly proceeding will be to act upon the amendments made in Committee of the Whole as they are reached in the reading. If the Chief Clerk is allowed to go on, every Senator will see what each amendment is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to reply to my friends from Ohio and Tennessee that I think as a mere matter of business the simplest way would be the one the Senator from Tennessee suggests; but if the Senator from Ohio feels that that might prolong the matter I certainly should not be willing to interfere with his wishes about it. There is no difficulty as the thing stands now.

Mr. HARRIS. I state to the Senator from Connecticut that if he deems it important that these amendments shall be considered in their order as to the point of time at which they were introduced, I learn at the Secretary's desk there is no difficulty whatever in pointing out the precise order in point of time in which every amendment was introduced; so that we can have no serious difficulty.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the time makes no difference.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not say that it does; but I understood the Senator from Connecticut as making the point as to the point of time at which amendments were offered for this reason: An amendment agreed to may make necessary various other amendments that were adopted because of the agreement to the previous amendment.

Mr. PLATT. I beg to say that I did not intend to be technical in the suggestions that I made. My difficulty about it was that I wanted to vote upon some of the amendments to the amendments in Committee of the Whole separately—

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then move to strike them out.

Mr. PLATT. As, for instance, some which were added yesterday afternoon to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. I wanted to be sure that we should have a separate vote upon some of the additional amendments to his amendment, and I did not want to be concluded by any action which might be taken.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the attention of the Senator from Vermont. I rise to ask a parliamentary question, whether an amendment is now in order to section 8, on page 8 of this bill. I understood the Senator from Vermont to say that this bill is now subject to amendment, and as this will be an amendment to the one adopted in Committee of the Whole, of course the amendment would have to be perfected in the Senate before the amendment itself is acted on.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is it; but the first amendment made in Committee of the Whole is separate from the latter part of the bill, and that of course will have to be first disposed of, and when we reach the part of the bill to which the Senator refers it will then be in order for any Senator to move to put it in any condition he likes.

Mr. FAULKNER. Is that the understanding of the Chair, that an amendment such as I desire to offer will not be in order until we reach the eighth section?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the first amendment made in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be again read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 4 of the reprinted bill, after the word "more," strike out "citizens" and insert "persons;" so as to read:

That all arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between two or more persons and corporations.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 1, line 5, after the word "both," to strike out "of different States or between two or more corporations, or both, of the United States and foreign states, or citizens or corporations thereof."

Mr. HARRIS. I do not find the language proposed to be stricken out in the printed copy that I hold in my hand.

Mr. PLATT. That is in the original amendment as reported by the Senator from Ohio. It was stricken out from that.

Mr. HARRIS. In my printed copy, in line 5, after the word "both," appears the language "made with a view or which tend to prevent full and free competition."

Mr. PLATT. These words occur in a previous print of the bill.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 1, line 15, page 2, after the word "such," to strike out "citizens" and insert "persons."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 17, page 2, after the word "articles," to insert "or of the value of money by which such cost may be advanced or reduced."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 27, page 2, after the word "execution," to insert:

And whenever in any action commenced under the provisions of this act in the name of the United States any arrangement, trust, or combination herein declared void is found by any such court to exist, the court may, in addition to other remedies, issue its writ of injunction, temporary or final, running and to be served anywhere within the United States, prohibiting and restraining the defendants, or any thereof, or their or any of their servants, agents, or attorneys, from proceeding further in the business of said arrangement, trust, or combination, except to wind up its affairs; and in case of any disobedience of any such writ of injunction, or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise, issued in any such cause, it shall be lawful for said court to issue writs of attachment, running and to be served anywhere within the United States, against the defendants, or any thereof, and against their or any of their agents, attorneys, or servants, of whatever name or office, disobeying said injunction or other process; and the court may, if it shall think fit, in addition to other lawful punishment for contempt, make an order directing any such defendants disobeying such writ of injunction, or other process, to pay such sum of money, not exceeding $1,000, for every day after a date to be named in such order that such defendant or defendants, or their or any of their agents, attorneys, or servants, as aforesaid, shall refuse or neglect to obey such injunction, or other process; and such money shall be paid into court, and may be paid in whole or in part to the party or parties upon whose complaint said action was instituted, or into the Treasury of the United States, as the court shall direct, and in any action brought by the United States under the provisions of this act the Attorney-General may bring the action in any district in which any one of the parties defendant resides or transacts business, and any other parties, corporate or otherwise, may, regardless of residence or location of business, be brought into court in said action in the manner provided by section 738 of the Revised Statutes, and the court shall thereupon have jurisdiction of the defendant or defendants so brought in as fully, to all intents and purposes, as if they had appeared in said action.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. In order to put this amendment in harmonious accord with the first clause of the section it will be necessary, in line 29, after the word "arrangement," to insert the words "contract, agreement," the same being divided by a comma. Inasmuch as the first part of the section provides "that all arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between two or more persons," etc., of course these terms should all be recited in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SHERMAN. There can be no objection to that.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is a formal amendment and there can be no objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the amendment to section 1, in line 29, after the word "arrangement," it is proposed to insert "contract, agreement."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. In line 36 the same character of amendment should be made after the word "arrangement."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 36, after the word "arrangement," insert "contract, agreement."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the honorable member of the Committee on Finance in charge of this bill to the clause on page 3, lines 61, 62, 63, and so on, which provides that the Attorney-General may bring the action before mentioned—

In any district in which any one of the parties defendant resides or transacts business, and any other parties, corporate or otherwise, may, regardless of residence or location of business, be brought into court in said action in the manner provided by section 738 of the Revised Statutes, and the court shall thereupon have jurisdiction of the defendant or defendants so brought in as fully, to all intents and purposes, as if they had appeared in said action.

Section 738 of the Revised Statutes is a section that has existed for nearly twenty years respecting suits concerning real estate. The real estate being located in a particular district and therefore there being the res, as the lawyers call it, the thing in controversy, within the jurisdiction of the court, the court is authorized, if direct service in that district by the marshal can not be obtained, to give notice by publication or otherwise, what is called a substituted service, to that party to appear and take care of his interests in regard to the property that the court has in hand. All that is right and safe and constitutional.

Now, this provision, as I understand it—perhaps I am wrong—is for a suit concerning a wrong done, and not concerning the right, title, or possession of property that is in the jurisdiction or possession of the court. I respectfully submit to the Committee on Finance that it is impossible under the Constitution of the United States, which provides for the preservation of private rights, for Congress to enact that a court in a particular district of the United States in a personal action between parties, and not in an action that relates to property which the court has in its jurisdiction or possession, can proceed by a publication or in any other such way—publication is enough for the illustration—to bind the defendant to the extent that a judgment against him would induce.

You can provide in this bill with entire safety that the process of the court shall run into any district of the United States, so that if a suit be commenced at Philadelphia and one of the defendants is in San Francisco, a part of a sugar trust, if you please, the court may direct a subpoena to the marshal at San Francisco, or the Philadelphia marshal, if it wishes him to travel so far, to serve that subpoena upon that defendant there and require him to appear at Philadelphia. It not being a criminal action, all this is easy enough; but to undertake to say under the Constitution, which was meant for the preservation of private rights in the United States and in all the States, that a person can be brought within the jurisdiction in this way is to me utterly unreasonable. The law seems, I think, to be perfectly well settled in that respect for a hundred years. It is impossible to give a court jurisdiction of a person unless you give that person personal notice that the matter which is to be tried about him is in hand in the court. If you are dealing with his property and the court has the property, then you may provide—because he is supposed to look out for his property and see what is being done about it—that publication will do; but if I sue my friend from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], who is doing me the honor to attend to what I am saying, in the district court of the State of Vermont on a promissory note, he having no property there to garnish, as the old phrase was, or to attach, as we call it in Vermont, I deny that Congress has the power to say that the circuit court for the district of Vermont may publish a notice in the Burlington Free Press or any other newspaper to the Senator from Delaware to appear and answer to that action, and that if judgment goes against him it binds him. It is totally out of the question.

Mr. GRAY. Let me ask the Senator from Vermont before he takes his seat whether I properly understand him. Section 738 of the Revised Statutes (which I have not before me, but I presume he has) refers entirely to this substituted service, and not at all to any provision enlarging the power of the United States courts to extend their process over an enlarged territory.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not at all. It only provides that the court in its discretion may publish or do what it likes—and that is perfectly right—in respect of what the lawyers call the res, in respect of property that the court is dealing with in the hands of the court, which is not the case that this bill provides for at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. This amendment was prepared by the Senator from Wisconsin. I am not able to say whether the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont is right or not. I would suggest, however, that the matter be passed over until the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Vermont can consult about the phraseology.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over temporarily, if there be no objection.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to suggest a similar amendment to those heretofore offered by me. In line 15 of section 1, on page 2, I move to insert, after the word "arrangements," the words "contracts, agreements."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That modification will be made, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as amended. The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made in Committee of the Whole was, in section 1, page 4, line 66, after the word "products," to insert the following:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to apply to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations between laborers made with a view of lessening the number of hours of their labor or of increasing their wages; nor to any arrangements, agreements, associations, or combinations among persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture made with the view of enhancing the price of their own agricultural or horticultural products.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is an amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and I call the attention of the Senate to it. In my judgment this amendment practically fritters away the substantial elements of this bill.

Mr. VANCE. What amendment is being considered?

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. BLAIR. That is not the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island. That is the one offered by the Senator from Ohio himself.

Mr. SHERMAN. This was an amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. BLAIR. The amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island is in italics. What was read was your own amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. The last part was an amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOODY in the chair). The amendment will be again read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 66 of section 1, after the word "action," the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, inserted the following:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to apply to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations between laborers made with a view of lessening the number of hours of their labor or of increasing their wages; nor to any arrangements, agreements, associations, or combinations among persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture made with the view of enhancing the price of their own agricultural or horticultural products.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is the amendment below that in italics that I object to.

Mr. HARRIS. Still, that language is an amendment to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. HARRIS. Then it must be acted upon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President—

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to ask the chairman, that we may consider this bill intelligently, whether all the amendments are printed in italics?

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems not. This proviso, from line 66 to line 73, was an amendment, but it is not printed in italics as an amendment because it was adopted before this print was made.

Mr. GRAY. Then there is nothing in this reprint to indicate all the amendments.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not all of them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I may just as well say the little I have to say about the general feature of this bill on this pending amendment as on any other, and perhaps better, because this pending amendment illustrates what I think are some of the intrinsic difficulties in the scheme.

I am in favor of the scheme in its fundamental desire and motive—most heartily in favor of it—directed to the breaking up of great monopolies which get hold of the whole of a particular business or production in the country and are enabled, therefore, to command everybody, laborer, consumer, producer, and everybody else, as the sugar trust and the oil trust, and whatever. Although for the time being the sugar trust has perhaps reduced the price of sugar, and the oil trust certainly has reduced the price of oil immensely, that does not alter the wrong of the principle of any trust; and that, in the brief definition of my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], is a phrase which covers every combination to get control of the life and the industry and the producing and the consuming classes of the country. I am in favor, most earnestly in favor, of doing everything that the Constitution of the United States has given Congress power to do, to repress and break up and destroy forever the monopolies of that character, because in the long run, however seductive they may appear in lowering prices to the consumer for the time being, all human experience and all human philosophy have proved that they are destructive of the public welfare and come to be tyrannies, grinding tyrannies, that have sometimes in other countries produced riots, just riots in the moral sense, and so on.

We can not shut up our eyes, Mr. President, to the fact that if capital combines, if great industrial establishments combine, like mining industries, iron industries, coal industries, gold industries, pork-packing industries, if any kind of the great operations of society combine, if the people who own the capital and the plant combine to regulate the price of the wages of laborers, just like the great armaments of Europe, labor is compelled to combine to defend itself; and so the country has been turned and other countries have been turned in the last forty years into great social camps of enemies when they ought to be one great camp of co-operative friends. The laborers, therefore, were quite right in combining to resist and defend themselves against the combinations of capital and property and plants, as they may be called. And it runs everywhere. It has run through every class of society, and it is one of the great evils in the social progress of this country, and every other which exists, that there is hardly a trade and there is scarcely an industry except the farmers that, in one way or another, has not combined to defend itself, and make aggressive warfare upon those with whom it is brought in contact by employment upon the one side or the other, or by purchase or sale. In this very Capital of the country, where we have exclusive power of legislation, supreme and unlimited within the boundaries of natural right, that everybody recognizes, every trade nearly, speaking broadly I can say every trade, masons, carpenters, plumbers, bakers, tailors, merchants, printers, have their combinations that are armed camps in the moral sense, making, when they think they can gain anything by it, aggressive warfare against that part of the rest of mankind that they are brought in relation and contact with one day, and defending themselves the next, it may be, against the aggressive warfare of another competition.

Mr. MORGAN. I would like to ask the Senator from Vermont if he has not knowledge of combinations in this city or elsewhere between bar associations and doctors for raising their price or fees also?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not. I do not belong to the bar association of this city, if there is one, and I do not know but that they may have a combination; but, as I have not the honor to be a member of that association, or any other that I know of in this world, except the humble church to which I belong, I can not say.

Mr. MORGAN. Does this bill reach any case of that kind?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know whether it does or not. I am speaking of the general subject.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to make a statement as to these bar associations, that are very common and almost universal? In the early days in Massachusetts, I have seen the records of one to which some very eminent lawyers belonged, including a gentleman afterwards the Attorney-General of the United States in Mr. Jefferson's time, where they agreed never to charge less to a client for advice than $1. [Laughter.] I do not know whether the Senator from Vermont ever belonged to that association or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I never did. I never got up to a dollar. I gave most of my advice free gratis, as the saying is. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. President, here is the fundamental difficulty, and, as I was saying, in this very town, where our legislative power is supreme, there go on these injurious armed camps and contests that are really against the interest of everybody in every single camp. I remember it is but a few months since that a citizen of the United States, as I was told and I believe truly, a man of good character and little money—they sometimes go together, Mr. President, even in the Senate of the United States—a man of good character and little money, with an interesting family, a practical printer, ingenious, skillful in his business, applied to be employed at the Government Printing Office, the national, legislative, and executive establishment to print the wise and learned things that we say from day to day. The Public Printer, I was told, wanted him; he was exactly the man for the place which was vacant; but unhappily, although a citizen of the United States of good character and skill, the Public Printer was told that if that man was suffered to enter into the employment of the United States nine-tenths, perhaps ninety-nine-one-hundredths, of all the printers employed by the United States in that establishment would not do any more work and would leave, and the country would go to destruction immediately because what we should have said yesterday would not appear in the RECORD to-day. The Public Printer, I believe, was not able—I will not say did not dare, but did not think it expedient—to take the man he wanted because, although a citizen, he did not belong to one of these particular camps.

If that is not tyranny, I do not know what is, and I think that the tyranny of a thousand men is infinitely worse than the tyranny of one man. All human experience and all human history prove that. The tyranny of the Commune in France while it lasted was infinitely more wicked than the tyranny of the King that the Commune overthrew.

Well, here we are. I do not blame the farmers of the United States at all. On the contrary, I support them, when everybody has turned into an armament against their interests, in organizing themselves to de-send them. They must do it so long as the thing goes on in this way, and therefore, so far as it is possible for the legislative power to exert itself to break up this international and interstate and intersocial warfare that is going on between classes—not classes of citizens as such, not classes of races as such, but classes of employment and interest, each one of which is right in itself and ought to be promoted to the best of the extent of the endeavors of all persons that are engaged in it—it should interpose against this warfare which is destructive of the welfare of them all.

But, if capital and plants and manufacturing industries organize to regulate and so to repress and diminish, if you please, below what it ought to be, the price of all the labor everywhere that is engaged in that kind of business, labor must organize to defend itself on the other side. If transportation companies and middlemen and exporters and dealers organize and arrange that they will give only so much for wheat, or corn, or pork, or whatever, the people who produce the wheat, the corn, the pork, or whatever, are driven to organize to defend themselves so far as they can against that species of tyranny. However, the whole thing is wrong, as it appears to me; and so I think the amendment is wrong, in the same way, which says that while the capital and the plant in any enterprise shall not combine to defend and protect itself, to increase the price of the product of that capital and plant, the labor which is essential to the production of that plant may combine to increase the price of the work that is to be done to make the production of that enterprise.

What is the consequence, Mr. President? The laborers of the United States, I will say for illustration—and one illustration is as good as the hundreds that might be brought forward—the laborers of the United States engaged in the manufacture of iron (which is, perhaps, the most largely valuable, take it altogether, of all the manufactured products of the United States) combine, as this bill authorizes them to do, to put up the price of their wages; they put them up 50 per cent., for illustration. The manufacturer of iron, the men who and whose fathers by their labor have found the iron mine and have built the iron-mill and the rolling mill, and the steel-process-mill, and all that sort of thing, are prohibited under penalties, as they ought to be under penalties, if they are prohibited at all, from combining to raise the price of the iron that the workmen have made cost 50 per cent. more and to sell at the advanced price if they can.

The consequence would be that, if the labor of the United States thus organized chose through its head men to put up the price of the manufactured iron, that iron could not be produced unless the price at which it was to be sold should be enhanced accordingly. The result is that every iron-mill in the United States must break, or live, not according to the demand for iron, not according to its production, but according to the will of the men employed to make it. Now, put it the other way—

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. Can not the manufacturers of iron practically put up the price, each for himself, according to the cost that it may be to him to manufacture, without combinations?

Mr. EDMUNDS. So he can undoubtedly, and so can the laborer put up the price in any particular mill of his labor in making that iron. They stand on a perfect equality before the law and in morals. There is no sin, I take it, in owning an iron mine or an iron-mill; it is morally right. There is no sin in being a puddler in a furnace, I take it; it is moral and right, and the income of the work of that puddler, his labor and his muscle and his intellect, are the capital that he puts into it. The product is the iron.

Mr. GEORGE. Allow me to ask another question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. If the capitalists, the manufacturers, are allowed to combine, they having large capital, they having the means to live and support their families during a shut-out or a shut-down of the work, what good will a combination of the laborers do when they would starve for want of their daily wages to feed themselves and their wives and children?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will not do any good at all; and if on the other hand the laborers combine and say, "We will not do this thing anywhere in the United States of America unless you give us all there is in it, and you shall not arrange among yourselves not to destroy each other and sell your things by common consent at a higher price than you did before, unless you go to the penitentiary" (for that is prohibited), what good will that do except to break down the whole interests of society and destroy everybody?

The fact is that this matter of capital, as it is called, of business, and of labor is an equation, and you can not disturb one side of the equation without disturbing the other. If it costs for labor 50 per cent. more to produce a ton of iron, that 50 per cent. more goes into what that iron must sell for, or some part of it. I take it everybody will agree to that.

Very well. Now, if you say to one side of that equation, "You may make the value or the price of this iron by your combination for wages in the whole Republic or on the continent, but the man for whom you have made the iron shall not arrange with his neighbors as to the price they will all sell it for, so as not to destroy each other," the whole business will certainly break, because the connection between the plant, as I will call it for short, and the labor that works that plant is one that no legislation and no force in the world—and there is only one outside of the world that can do it—can possibly separate. They can not be divorced. Neither speeches nor laws nor judgments of courts nor anything else can change it; and therefore I say that to provide on one side of that equation that there may be combination and on the other side that there shall not, is contrary to the very inherent principle upon which such business must depend. If we are to have equality, as we ought to have, if the combination on the one side is to be prohibited, the combination on the other side must be prohibited or there will be certain destruction in the end.

Mr. President, as I said before—and I am not going to take up the time of the Senate—I shall be glad within the constitutional limits, which are narrow but clear, in the regulation of commerce to go just as far as Congress has the power to go in breaking up these great monopolies that exist to the detriment and the injury of mankind in this country and in every other. They are in every other country as well as in this. They exist in free-trade countries and in tariff countries and under all social conditions, and have come up mainly within the last twenty or thirty years. But I can not go any further. I do not wish to hold out a false hope to the people of the United States, be they farmers or mere workingmen, as they are sometimes called, although everybody in the United States who is fit to be a citizen and is well ought to be and generally is a workingman in the best sense of the term; whether he drives a cart or whether he devotes himself to the business of the country in the Senate of the United States, he is equally, in my judgment, a workingman.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to make a request of the Senator before he commences his argument on the constitutional question, and that request is this, that the Senator will not, owing to any pressure or supposed pressure of want of time, fail to go into that matter fully, so that we can all understand his position on that subject. That is the request I make.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The constitutional question, Mr. President, has been discussed so fully that I could add very little, if anything, to the argument; and on that point I will only state, now at any rate, very briefly indeed what I think about it.

The Constitution of the United States intended to leave and did leave, as I think—and I think so because the Constitution says so—to the States of the Union the right of local self-government in every respect except those named that were granted to the National Government. It did not give to the Congress of the United States, and it did not mean to give, and it ought not to have given to it, and ought not to give to it now, I think, the power to enter into the police regulations of the people of the United States to endeavor to conduct or to manage or to regulate their affairs as the States, in every State of the Union, have been authorized—not authorized, but left by the Constitution in their original right to do.

I believe, Mr. President, that the safety of the Republic as a nation, one people, one hope, one destiny, depends more largely upon the preservation of what are called the rights of the States covering a continent than upon any other one thing. I therefore should be slow to step over that line by voting for any act of Congress that I thought went beyond it, over the boundary that the Constitution has prescribed to the authority of the United States in Congress assembled in dealing with the business of the people of the several States, no matter how evil that business may be, no matter how injurious to the public welfare apparently or really at the moment it may be. I think it is better to endure a present evil of even the most grinding and most stupendous of monopolies than to step by one inch or attempt to step by one inch over the clear boundary line that has been established and continued between the Congress of the United States and the legislative and judicial powers of the States in respect of such subjects.

The Constitution has given to Congress the power to impose taxes. It has given to Congress the power to regulate commerce among the several States and with foreign nations. Just as far as we can go in regulating the transition of property from State to State, as we have done in the interstate-commerce law for the benefit of the whole people whose interests are common, as I said before, it is our right to go; and when a clear evil appears, as undoubtedly now exists, just as far as we can go in exerting the power that is given to us, I am willing to go; but I am not willing to go any further.

I am not willing to hold out to the people of the United States, the citizens of each State, any or all of them, an illusory and deceptive attempt at the redress of grievances, which will turn out in the end to be purely deceptive and illusory, mere dust and ashes, when it comes to the test of the resistance of anybody who is undertaken to be dealt with under our law. I have more confidence, Mr. President, in the people of the United States. The citizens of the State of Vermont are no more my constituents than the citizens of the State of California, for a Senator of the United States, although elected by the Legislature of the State from which he comes, becomes a Senator of the United States, and every human being within the broad boundaries of the Republic, from the shore of the stormy sea on the east to the tranquil one on the west, is my constituent; but if every citizen of the State of Vermont, my friends and neighbors, in an impulse, a just impulse of resentment at any grinding monopoly that had got possession of all the sugar that my people consume, should implore me to pass an act of Congress to abolish the sugar trust, as the Legislature of the State of Vermont might do if it were established there, I should feel it my duty to them to say, "No, because I have not the power to do it," and I should expect, if I were a candidate for re-election at the time they elected members of the Legislature, when they had two weeks to think about it, that they would say, "Our Senator has done right; he was put there for six years in order that he might have strength and courage enough, when we were in an impulse of passion, or resentment, or enthusiasm, or whatever you may call it, to do what we sent him to do and what he had sworn to do, that he would stand by the law as it is and follow his duty irrespective of any clamor."

I do not think, therefore, Mr. President, that we need concern ourselves about any popular impulse at this present moment of time, about any outcry in the newspapers, or at meetings, or at alliances, or whatever methods the people have of getting together to express their views concerning what we ought to do or ought not to do beyond what we clearly have a right to do. I do not believe that the people of the United States wish to have the Senate make haste in running to please them with a delusion and a snare which they will find out next year has been perfectly ineffective and perfectly incapable of execution, because Congress had gone beyond the power that it ought to have known it possessed.

That is my faith, Mr. President, in the people of the United States. Having that faith, I do not feel impelled by any sentiment or desire of popularity to-day to go beyond the lines that the Constitution has clearly marked out to us.

If we can exert the taxing power to repress and discourage "futures" and "options," as they are called, I shall be glad to exert it, as we exerted the taxing power in order to diminish the evil of the fraudulent butter or oleomargarine business; but in order to exert the taxing power I had supposed that it was indispensable that what are called the more immediate representatives of the people at the other end of the Capitol should be first appealed to and that they should first act. If, however, you put it, as this bill does, upon the ground of a license, I am unable to see, a license being a police measure, where the Congress of the United States gets the power to license anything whatever, except in the District of Columbia and the Territories, over which the Constitution says Congress shall have control. This bill on the face of it says that this tax is imposed as a police measure in order to repress and suppress the real evil, as it is, of this gambling, for that is what it is, in what are called "futures" and "options" and so on.

It is true that for the purpose of taxation and on the face of the statutes for the purpose of taxation, Congress, in order to raise a tax out of whisky, for instance, provides that every person producing whisky shall be identified. Call it a license if you please; I do not know that it is, but we will call it that if you please; still, it is a tax and a tax as a tax, and by whatever name the phrase of the statute may call it, it is a measure of revenue on its face, whatever may be the motive; and I suppose the motive in the case of whisky is the motive of revenue alone, and in the case of oleomargarine I suppose the motive was the general welfare of the people, to prevent frauds.

But when a statute of the United States is presented to the Supreme Court saying that this license tax which we impose is a police tax, as the bill now says, I am very much afraid, speaking with the greatest possible deference, that the court would say, "We can not inquire into the motives of the legislative body in passing a particular act, but when they put into the statute the ground upon which it rests and the purpose for which it is enacted we are compelled to take it as Congress has stated, and that this is an undertaking to regulate the good order of society" by regulating a business in each State for the purpose of regulating it, just as the State of Vermont and the State of Alabama and every other State provide for the licensing of inn-keepers, if you please, in order to the protection of travelers, and so on, the licensing of doctors in order to protect human life and health against quacks and humbugs and nostrums and all that sort of thing, and so on through; but within our power of levying a tax as a tax upon any kind of business, putting it as a tax and beginning as it ought to do upon any object which is injurious to the general welfare, of course that is the kind of occupation that ought to be taxed.

Every State, when it makes any discrimination at all, taxes those employments and occupations that are least useful to the community and gets the most money it can out of those things that if taken out of it prove the least burden upon the best and the well ordered people of the community. That is all right. That is motive, but it is a tax.

So, Mr. President, so far as we can provide in the regulation of commerce for impeding and harassing and cutting up the commercial transactions between the States of these great monopolies, I am most earnestly for it. So far as we can not do it, I am opposed to it, because I believe that the ultimate and the immediate welfare of the people of the United States is much more largely concerned in not overstepping the Constitution by what will turn out to be illusory and ineffectual and void operations merely for the reason that there is a present trouble.

If this bill can be brought within the provisions of impeding just as far as we may as a regulation of commerce the movement of the commodities of these great concerns and the arrangement of their transactions between the different States, as the Senator from Texas had the broad idea in his bill, I should certainly be most glad to do it, but as the thing now stands it is quite impossible for me—very likely I am entirely wrong—but it is quite impossible for me to support it.

I am sorry, Mr. President, to have taken the time which I have.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment last reported.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read again.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, line 66, section 1, after the word "action," the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, inserted the following clause:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to apply to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations between laborers made with a view of lessening the number of hours of their labor or of increasing their wages; nor to any arrangements, agreements, associations, or combinations among persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture made with the view of enhancing the price of their own agricultural or horticultural products.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I wish to state in one single sentence my opinion in regard to this particular provision. If I correctly understood the Senator from Vermont—I did not hear him fully, and very likely, hearing only a part of what he said, I did not apprehend it—he thought that the applying to laborers in this respect a principle which was not applied to persons engaged in the large commercial transactions which are chiefly aimed at by this bill was indefensible in principle. Now, it seems to me there is a very broad distinction which, if borne in mind, will warrant not only this exception to the general provision of the bill, but a great deal of other legislation which we enact, or attempt to enact, relating to the matter of labor.

When you are speaking of providing to regulate the transactions of men who are making corners in wheat, or in iron, or in woolen or in cotton goods, speculating in them or lawfully dealing in them without speculation, you are aiming at a mere commercial transaction, the beginning and end of which is the making of money for the parties, and nothing else. That is the only relation that transaction has to the State. It is the creation or diffusion or change of ownership of the wealth of the community. But when a laborer is trying to raise his wages or is endeavoring to shorten the hours of his labor, he is dealing with something that touches closely, more closely than anything else, the Government and the character of the state itself.

The maintenance of a certain standard of profit in dealing in large transactions in wheat, or cotton, or wool is a question whether a particular merchant or a particular class of merchants shall make money or not, or shall deal lawfully or not, shall affect the state injuriously or not; but the question whether the standard of the laborer's wages shall be maintained or advanced, or whether the leisure for instruction, for improvement, shall be shortened or lengthened, is a question which touches the very existence and character of government of the state itself. The laborer who is engaged lawfully and usefully and accomplishing his purpose in whole or in part in endeavoring to raise the standard of wages is engaged in an occupation the success of which makes republican government itself possible and without which the Republic can not in substance, however it may nominally do in form, continue to exist.

I hold, therefore, that as legislators we may constitutionally, properly, and wisely allow laborers to make associations, combinations, contracts, agreements for the sake of maintaining and advancing their wages, in regard to which, as a rule, their contracts are to be made with large corporations who are themselves but an association or combination or aggregation of capital on the other side. When we are permitting and even encouraging that, we are permitting and encouraging what is not only lawful, wise, and profitable, but absolutely essential to the existence of the commonwealth itself.

When, on the other hand, we are dealing with one of the other classes, the combinations aimed at chiefly by this bill, we are dealing with a transaction the only purpose of which is to extort from the community, monopolize, segregate, and apply to individual use, for the purposes of individual greed, wealth which ought properly and lawfully and for the public interest to be generally diffused over the whole community.

Without entering upon a general discussion of the merits of this bill, it seemed to me proper to make this observation in regard to what, if I understand him correctly, had fallen from my honorable and distinguished friend from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts, for whose opinions I have the greatest possible respect, understood me quite correctly, as he has stated, and he has stated a great deal better and more strongly than I could the value of improving the condition of the laboring people of the United States, in the sense in which he uses that term, as people who earn their daily bread by the work of their hands, not having accumulated sufficient capital or not having had sufficient opportunity to go into business for themselves. I agree to all that entirely. But when the laborer, unless he labors for himself in his own plant—and then he is not laboring for wages—when the wage-earner is to earn wages he must earn them from somebody that employs him. That is absolutely indispensable, and it only needs stating; it is the merest commonplace. There must be somebody on the other side of what I called a little while ago the equation. They are inseparable.

The laborer can not earn wages by looking at the sky, as beautiful as it is; he cannot earn wages by looking at the sea, as deep as it is. He must earn wages by finding somebody who can afford—unless he breaks and they both go to the bottom—to pay him the price he demands for his day's work. That somebody is a corporation, as the Senator says as one illustration. That corporation is only an association of persons. There is no corporation in the world and never can be, for business purposes at any rate, that is not simply a form of association of human beings just like the association of the laborers.

He deals, therefore, on the other side with a human being, and he wishes to earn the highest wage he can. If he gets that wage paid to him, the thing that he has done must be worth the money that is paid to him for doing it or his employer will fail, and then he will have nothing to do and the whole business will stop. That sort of thing has happened a thousand times, and it is happening every day in every State of the Union where an enterprise in which five men, ten men, one hundred men, a thousand men and women are engaged in helping carry on by the work of their hands, for wages, goes down into the bottomless pit of bankruptcy because the amount of wages paid and the other expenses of the establishment do not bring out money enough to carry it on on that scale. There is no getting away from that, and therefore, if the wage-earner is to command the operation of the statute and the wage-payer can not go to the community and to his brother manufacturers in the same town and say, "Let us agree to put up the wages of our laborers in all our establishments, as they wish a dollar a day more, and let us put the price on our commodity that goes out a dollar a ton more, or whatever it may be, to make that good so that we can all live and get on," the two sides of the equation are not on an equal footing.

On the one side you say that is a crime and on the other side you say it is a valuable and proper undertaking. That will not do, Mr. President. You can not get on in that way. It is impossible to separate them; and the principle of it, therefore, is that if one side, no matter which it is, is authorized to combine the other side must be authorized to combine, or the thing will break and there will be universal bankruptcy. That is what it will come to, and then the laborer, whose interest and welfare we are all so really desirous to promote, will turn around and justly say to the Senate of the United States, "Why did you go to such legislation as that? Why did you attempt to stimulate and almost require us to combine against our employers, and thus break down the whole industry of the country and leave us all beggars? When you allowed us to combine and to regulate our wages, why did you not allow the products that our hands produced to be raised in price by an arrangement, so that everybody that bought them might pay the increased price, and everybody that was making them all around for whom we were working could live also?" I do not think, as a practical thing, Mr. President, that anybody will thank us for making a distinction of that kind.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, a word or two which fell from the lips of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] induces me to think that he does not comprehend the scope of this bill. In pointing out the difference between allowing associations and combinations of laborers to unite in order to increase their wages and the combinations forbidden by the bill, he spoke of the object of this bill being to reach the great monopolistic and capitalistic corporations and associations which are oppressing the people.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. I did not. If he will allow me I certainly made no such suggestion consciously.

Mr. PLATT. What did the Senator think was the object of the bill?

Mr. HOAR. I said the object of this bill was to prevent the speculation in and engrossing of wheat and similar commodities. I did not speak in that connection of corporations. I said, in speaking generally of the lawfulness and propriety of laborers combining in regard to the matter of their wages, that the persons with whom they were to contract were very largely the corporations which were themselves nothing but a combination or aggregation of capital for that purpose. I made no such suggestion as that corporations were the persons aimed at by this bill. That was in a different connection.

Mr. PLATT. Taking the explanation of the Senator from Massachusetts as he now makes it, that the object of the bill is chiefly to reach the transactions of associated capital engaged in putting up the price of wheat and the necessities of life or putting them down, gambling in them or dealing in them, I want to say that the scope of this bill is very much wider and broader than that, and for that reason I can not vote for it.

If this bill were aimed only at people who are doing wrong, if it were aimed only at illegitimate business transactions, if it were aimed only at those men and that kind of business which ought to be repressed in this country, it would not have a stronger defender or a more enthusiastic supporter than myself. But it is because it is utterly without discrimination in its provisions that I oppose it. While its supporters say that it is a bill aimed at wrongful transactions, at wrongful combinations of capital, it is in its very terms a bill which is aimed at every business and every business transaction in the United States, and if it should reach, repress, restrain, and prevent the wrongful acts of wrongful associations and combinations, the benefit that would be thereby accomplished would be a hundred, a thousand times outweighed by the disastrous effects which it would have upon the legitimate business interests of this country.

That is the fault with this bill. It attempts, because it sees some guilty persons, to punish all persons, guilty and innocent alike; because certain persons in business are doing things which are deemed to be reprehensible, it would strike an unjust and cruel blow at all business transactions in the country; and it seems strange, Mr. President, that the authors of the bill can not see this.

Now, take the portion of the bill as it stands to-day which was in the original bill reported by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. HOAR. Before my honorable friend proceeds, I should like to ask him to do perhaps what he is about to proceed to do, but I wish to remark that what I said in response to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] was not intended either as a defense of the bill or an attack upon it, but to point out what I thought the Senator from Vermont failed to appreciate thoroughly, the distinction between the associations of laborers and this class of cases at which this bill aims.

Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut to point out to the Senate and to me what he thinks is prohibited in this bill which is not prohibited by the general common law, as he and I learned it in our studies, in regard to such things as are covered by the English common law.

I wish to say in all sincerity that my mind is yet in a state of doubt whether I can or not vote for this bill as it is finally left. I think it has been improved very much since it was reported, and, on the other hand, I have grave doubt whether it is not liable to the objection which the Senator has just stated to us, that it attacks what is innocent and lawful and necessary.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, the first section of this bill, which I am now commenting on, is complicated and involved, and I desire to read, leaving out some things from this section, but leaving out nothing which in any way changes the effect or the real intent and meaning of the bill as applied to the persons of whom I am now speaking, and I beg Senators to listen.

The bill provides that—

All arrangements, contracts, agreements between two or more persons, which tend to prevent full and free competition in articles of growth, production, or manufacture of any State or Territory of the United States with similar articles of the growth, production, or manufacture by any other State or Territory, and all arrangements between such persons which tend to advance the cost to the consumer of any such article are hereby declared to be against public policy, unlawful, and void.

That is the real meaning of this bill. That is, all arrangements whatever looking to the objects which are pointed out in the bill, between any two or more persons, are unlawful. In other words, this bill proceeds upon the false assumption that all competition is beneficial to the country, and that every advance of price is an injury to the country. That is the assumption upon which this bill proceeds. There never was a greater fallacy in the world. Competition, which this bill provides for as between any two persons, must be full and free. Unrestricted competition is brutal warfare, and injurious to the whole country. The great corporations of this country, the great monopolies of this country are every one of them built upon the graves of weaker competitors that have been forced to their death by remorseless competition. I am entirely sick of this idea that the lower the prices are the better for the country, and that any effort to advance prices, no matter how low they may be, and that any arrangement between persons engaged in business to advance prices, no matter how low they may be, is a wrong and ought to be repressed and punished.

The true theory of this matter is that prices should be just and reasonable and fair, that prices, no matter who is the producer or what the article, should be such as will render a fair return to all persons engaged in its production, a fair profit on capital, on labor, and on everything else that enters into its production. When the price of any commodity, I do not care whether it is wheat or iron, I do not care whether it is corn or silverware—whenever the price of any commodity is forced below that standard, the whole country suffers. We have been running to bankruptcy and ruin and distress. But the theory of this bill is that, no matter how much the price may have been depressed, no matter how losing the business may be, the parties engaged in it must have no understanding between themselves by which they will come together and say that they will obtain a fair and a fairly remunerative price for the article which they produce. That is wicked, the bill says.

We have five thousand manufacturing establishments in the State of Connecticut, or had by the last census, and I think that gentlemen will hunt up and down that State and its borders without finding many of the trusts at which it is said this bill is aimed.

Mr. GEORGE. Without finding any?

Mr. PLATT. I said without finding "many" of the trusts.

Mr. GEORGE. I thought the gentleman said "any."

Mr. PLATT. Without finding many of the trusts at which this bill is aimed.

What I mean to say is that the great bulk of manufacturing in Connecticut, both as to the establishments and the amount of production, is carried on by men and associations of comparatively small capital, most of whom have sprung up from the ranks of labor themselves, and who have largely associated with laborers in engaging in their business. I do not deny that there may be some trusts there; but the bill which is aimed at those trusts reaches every arrangement, all arrangements, innocent or guilty, which those persons may make under any circumstances to preserve themselves from ruin and bankruptcy. It reaches more than that: every merchant in the State of Connecticut; all business in which persons who are engaged in this deadly, brutal warfare which is called competition think it for their advantage to come together and obtain fair prices for the articles in which they are dealing.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question? He says the bill reaches all those corporations and individuals. I want to know how it can reach every citizen in Connecticut whose bargain shall begin and be carried on and finally consummated in the midst of that State?

Mr. PLATT. I will show my colleague.

Mr. HAWLEY. How can it?

Mr. PLATT. I am not speaking about that. I find it is very unpopular here to refer to any proposed act as not being authorized by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. And unfashionable.

Mr. PLATT. And I find that I am liable to considerable criticism if I make any argument against this bill because it transcends the constitutional power of Congress, and so I am taking the bill as it is on the face of it.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me just one word?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I think the Senator ought to share the unpopularity of criticising the bill as being against the Constitution as well as some of the balance of us who have convictions that compel us to make those criticisms.

Mr. PLATT. I am not by any means a very strict constructionist of the Constitution; I think in a great many matters I am deemed to be extremely liberal in my views of the powers which Congress may exercise under the Constitution of the United States; but at the risk of unpopularity and of being declared to be unfashionable and of being criticised, I will say that in this whole bill, so far as I read it, there is but one constitutional provision, and that is that provision of the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] in his amendment which confines the bills to persons engaged in transportation—for that is the effect of his amendment—that uproots the interstate-commerce law, drives that by the board, repeals that law. If it be thought by the Senate that that is good policy, I do not object to that on the ground of unconstitutionality.

I am being diverted for the moment from the answer to the question asked by my colleague, but while I am diverted I desire to say this: It is not two years since this Senate was exercised over the idea that there must be something done to prevent the ruinous rate wars between railroads or that impending disaster was to be precipitated upon the country. And so we provided, in the interstate-commerce act, provisions which we thought would prevent these ruinous rate wars. We agreed then that ruinous competition among railroads was not for the interest of any portion of the people of this country. We provided that if they advanced rates in their joint tariffs they should give ten days' notice; that if they reduced rates by their joint tariffs they should give three days' notice. But here comes this amendment of the Senator from Texas, who has been godfather at least to the interstate-commerce act, and sweeps that all away and says that if those engaged in making joint tariffs shall ever advance a rate they shall go to State prison and pay $10,000 fine. That is the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

Now let me return to the question asked me by my colleague. He asked me how it could be done. I do not think it can, but I propose to deal with this bill as it reads. It seizes, lays hold of all articles of growth, production, or manufacture of any State which compete with similar articles of growth, production, or manufacture of any other State. That is what it attempts to lay its hand upon, and that is all-inclusive. It takes all articles. You can scarcely find an article of commerce, an article of merchandise in any State which does not compete with similar articles which are the growth, production, or manufacture of another State. So then, this bill sweeps in all business. It sweeps in the dealing in every article; it sweeps in the transactions of every merchant; it sweeps in the transactions of every manufacturer and of every producer. What does it say shall happen, what does it say is wrong with regard to such articles? for it includes all articles of trade. That all arrangements and agreements between two or more persons which tend to advance the cost to the consumer of any such article is "hereby declared to be against public policy, unlawful, and void."

Now, I want to illustrate a little. I have just received from the commissioner of labor in the State of Connecticut advance sheets of his forthcoming report. He has investigated a great many industries of the State of Connecticut. He has taken representative establishments in the State of Connecticut, and he has tabulated under different heads the result of their business operations in different years. By this report I want to show what the result was, during the year 1887, in eight representative woolen establishments in the State of Connecticut. They employed 1,967 persons. They had a capital of $2,904,404. The value of their manufactured goods was $3,299,871.21. The value of the stock and materials was $2,076,198.47. The cost of manufacture, less rent, interest, and taxes was $1,134,058.76. Rent and interest and taxes were $94,585.59. Superintendence, including all non-producers, was $96,696.66. Wages paid were $664,143.77. The gross profits were $89,613.98. There were no net profits, but a net loss of $4,971.61.

Mr. GEORGE. A loss of that much?

Mr. PLATT. The net loss in the eight establishments was $4,971.61.

I allude to this for the purpose of showing that here were eight representative woolen establishments in the State of Connecticut that, not taking into account the matter of loss by bad debts, lost in that year's business in the aggregate $4,971.61—not a great loss I will agree.

Mr. GEORGE. Is that on the supposition that they collected every debt?

Mr. PLATT. That is upon the supposition that they collected every debt. Nothing is allowed here for loss by bad debts.

Mr. FRYE. Nothing for the depreciation of the property in the mill, either.

Mr. PLATT. No; and I think I am justified in saying that these concerns have since lost many thousand dollars by a failure in New York, but I speak of it for this: They are running their business at a loss; they are making articles to which this bill refers; and this bill says that if those eight men should combine to get a fair, living profit upon their manufacture, that contract, that agreement is against public policy, unlawful and void. That is but an illustration. It runs all through the business of my State and of the United States.

I do not like to vote against this bill. I believe that there are combinations in this country which are criminal, but I believe that every man in business—I do not care whether he is a farmer, a laborer, a miner, a sailor, a manufacturer, a merchant—has a right, a legal and a moral right, to obtain a fair profit upon his business and his work; and if he is driven by fierce competition to a spot where his business is unremunerative, I believe it is his right to combine for the purpose of raising prices until they shall be fair and remunerative. This bill makes no distinction. It says that every combination which has the effect in any way to advance prices is illegal and void. The Senator from Ohio in the first speech which he made here admitted that there were combinations in which there was no wrong, and yet he leveled his bill at them equally with the combinations which are doing wrong.

I do not believe there is in this country among any class of people a real desire that anybody shall do business without receiving a fair profit, without receiving a fair remuneration for the capital, skill, and work employed in carrying on the business, and I do not believe that there is any class of people in this country who, when they face this false assumption that cheap prices are the great, beneficent thing for the country and think of it, will agree to that proposition. Whenever the price of anything is below what it costs to produce it, it ought to be raised, and any combination for the purpose of raising it to a point where the price is fair and reasonable ought not to be condemned; it ought to be encouraged. It will not do, because a few concerns in this country are attempting to put prices where they are unreasonable, to enrich themselves beyond a fair compensation or equivalent for their capital, their skill, and their enterprise—it will not do to cast out your drag-net and bring within the condemnation of your law all the legitimate business enterprises of the country that are struggling along and trying to obtain only fair and reasonable prices for their goods, and who are giving life to labor, and peace and plenty to the whole land.

As I said, there is no greater fallacy than that the cheaper prices are the better it is for the community. It is not true. The farmer understands it when his wheat or his corn does not bring the cost of production, and this Senate is quick to see it and provide in this bill that there may be combinations in such cases. The farmer is not outside of the general economic principle. We do not raise wheat in the East; we consume it. Why should the Eastern man not be permitted to say, then, being a consumer of wheat, according to the theory of this bill, that as the price is down you must not raise it; you must not enhance the cost of flour to the consumer. We make no such contention as that. But there can not be two principles upon which a law shall stand. It must stand upon one principle. The theory of this bill is that prices must never be advanced by any two or more purposes, no matter how ruinously low they may be. That theory I denounce as utterly untenable, as immoral.

So, Mr. President, I can not vote for this bill in the shape in which

I think it will come to a vote or in any shape in which I think it will be perfected. I am ready to go to the people of the State of Connecticut; I have faith and confidence in them; and when I tell them that here is a bill which, under the guise of dealing with trusts, would strike a cruel blow at their entire industries, I know that they will see it and understand it; and if there be a people anywhere in this country who can not understand it it is better for a Senator to answer to his judgment and his conscience than it is to answer to their misapprehension.

I am sorry, Mr. President, that we have not had a bill which had been carefully prepared, which had been thoughtfully prepared, which had been honestly prepared, to meet the object which we all desire to meet. The conduct of this Senate for the past three days—and I make no personal allusions—has not been in the line of the honest preparation of a bill to prohibit and punish trusts. It has been in the line of getting some bill with that title that we might go to the country with. The questions of whether a bill would be operative, of how it would operate, or whether it was within the power of Congress to enact it, have been whistled down the wind in this Senate as idle talk, and the whole effort has been to get some bill headed "A bill to punish trusts" with which to go to the country.

The distinguished author of the bill, the Senator in charge of it on this floor, when the Senator from Texas proposed his amendment, opposed it, and when the Senator from Kansas proposed his amendment opposed it and said that it ought to be voted down; and yet the moment they were put on the bill he seemed to be as thoroughly anxious for the passage of the bill with those amendments upon it as he had been of his own. We should legislate better than that. Every effort to refer this bill to any committee that would give it careful and honest consideration has been voted down in this Senate, and it is better to vote the bill down than it is to go to the people with a measure which shall resemble the apples which grow in the region of that fated plain on which once stood the city of Sodom. We may make this bill look like a beautiful remedy; we may call it a bill to punish trusts, but when you attempt to put it in operation it will be,

Like that Dead Sea fruit,
All ashes to the taste;

or it will be found to be a blow struck at the legitimate industries of the country such as they will not recover from in years and years.

Mr. WALTHALL. Mr. President, if it be in order at this time, I will move to refer this bill and the amendments to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report within twenty days.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL] to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report within twenty days. On that motion the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I transfer the pair I have with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] to the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], who has been called away from the Chamber necessarily.

Mr. HAMPTON (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. DIXON], but as he voted the other day to refer this bill to the committee I shall vote "yea."

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. CASEY].

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am informed that the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], with whom I have a general pair, would favor this motion. I therefore vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Following the wishes of the Senator in charge of the bill, I vote "nay."

Mr. ALLISON (after having voted in the negative). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], and therefore withdraw my vote. The Senator from Nevada, if present, would vote for the reference and I should vote against it.

Mr. HIGGINS. I am paired generally with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. I do not know how he would vote on this question so I withhold my vote. Were I free to vote, I should vote "yea." [A pause.] I am informed that on a similar motion yesterday the Senator from New Jersey voted in the affirmative, and therefore I feel free to vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—31.

So the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. The vote included the pending amendments?

Mr. EDMUNDS. They go with the bill as a matter of parliamentary law.

I ask unanimous consent to have read at the desk a not very long extract from the last monthly report of the Department of Agriculture which bears upon the question we have been considering, that I intended to have read when I had the honor to address the Senate, but the pamphlet was misplaced. I should hope that the Associated Press would send the substance of it (it is not my speech, but an official document) to the newspapers of the country in order that the people engaged in agriculture may see what the Department of Agriculture says about the causes of the depression in the price of farm products. I ask unanimous consent that the matter may now be read, although the bill has been disposed of.

Mr. PLUMB. What report is it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is the last monthly report of the Department of Agriculture.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. COCKRELL. If we give unanimous consent to the reading of that one-sided argument it might appear that the Senate was assenting to the false position taken in it. I simply desire to say that in my judgment the article is not correct either in its facts or in its method of reasoning, and I do not want, by giving my consent for it to be read and printed, to be considered as assenting directly or indirectly to anything that is said in it.

Mr. VORHEES. I desire to say further that while I make no objection I look upon the document as gotten up for an occasion and to serve a purpose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The matter referred to will be read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

AGRICULTURAL DEPRESSION AND ITS CAUSES.

There is almost universal complaint among farmers of all nations of the prevalence of low prices. The agricultural depression of Great Britain has probably been more severe than that of any other nation. A potent cause in this case is the competition from all parts of the world unrelieved by any taxation of imports. France and Germany are somewhat disturbed by similar complaints of unremunerative rural industry. Italy has also had occasion to make official investigation of the causes of agricultural depression. Other countries are vocal with similar cries of dissatisfaction with the proceeds of agricultural labor. So the trouble appears to be general in monarchies and republics, whether the monetary circulation is gold or silver or paper, and under the influence of various and diverse economic systems.

Not all countries are in the same depths of distress. In ours farmers and farm laborers are doubtless better fed and clothed, able to maintain a higher style of living, and enjoy more of the benefits of civilization and culture than those of any other country. It may be said with absolute truth that in thirty years the scale of living has advanced immensely in this country, not equally in all sections, but manifestly everywhere. There is a tendency to extravagance in town life that has been initiated in rural circles, and the natural ambition for progress and precedence, when generally aroused, will express itself in dissatisfaction with prevailing conditions and a determination to overpower all obstacles to advancement. This is a hopeful sign. It is an indication of conscious dignity. It is a prophecy of progress.

While, therefore, our own country feels the effect of agricultural depression less than almost any other in the world, the reduction in prices of most staples, and in domestic animals and their products, forces a disagreeable comparison with agricultural values at their highest, compels reduced expenditure to keep outgo subordinate to income, increases the number of unfortunates who can not make "both ends meet," and reduces the profits of the enterprising and skillful who are still able to strike a balance in their favor. Retrenchment is not an agreeable alternative, and is therefore delayed until its compulsion is imperative and perhaps destructive. "The times" are universally regarded as "hard" in comparison with more prosperous eras of the past.

It matters not that the prices of implements, utensils, and fabrics, of goods desired by the farmer, have been reduced proportionately; his interest account, if he has one, is unreduced, and his mortgage is a greater burden to lift. He sighs for the good old days of high prices, though they may have been war or famine prices, necessarily temporary, and though they may have been the source of extravagant views, unnecessary expenditure, and the foundation of his present indebtedness. He naturally resents and deplores low valuation of farm products. What are the causes of low prices? They may be various, but the prime cause is the operation of the inexorable law of supply and demand. Abundance leads inevitably to low prices; scarcity to high prices. With either there is fluctuation, a see-saw of prices which increases cost and reduces profit. Medium and uniform values are therefore best for the farmer.

There has been an increase of production in this country even more rapid than the increment of population. America has long been the synonym of plethora. Her people probably consume more than those of any other nation, and have a larger surplus for foreign needs. Immigration has been heavy and unrestricted; railroad building has been stimulated until an empire of new and productive lands has been opened; and these lands have been given ad libitum to settlers of native or foreign birth. Speculation first and profitable utilization afterwards have been the motive for settlement and development which have astonished the world and caused overproduction and low prices. The following statement shows the increase in thirty years in certain products of the farm, as reported by the census:

Products.	1849.	1859.	1869.	1879.
Corn.....bushels...	592,071,104	838,792,742	760,944,549	1,754,591,676
Wheat.....do.....	100,485,944	173,104,924	287,745,626	459,483,137
Oats.....do.....	146,584,179	172,643,185	282,107,157	407,858,999
Potatoes.....do.....	65,797,899	111,148,867	143,337,473	169,458,539
Cotton.....bales.....	2,469,093	5,387,052	3,011,996	5,755,359
Hay.....tons.....	13,638,642	19,083,896	27,316,048	35,150,711

If we extend the comparison to the present date, we find that the corn crop exceeds 2,000,000,000 bushels, wheat approximates 500,000,000, oats exceed 700,000,000, and hay and potatoes have increased in similar proportion. While the product may be three or four times as large, the population is less than three times as much, though the proportion of workers engaged in agriculture was larger than now.

During the forty years from 1850 to the present time the cotton product increased from a little over 2,000,000 bales to more than 7,000,000 bales. Cattle have also increased very rapidly; cows from between 6,000,000 and 7,000,000 to about 16,000,000; other cattle from scarcely 12,000,000 to more than 36,000,000. While sheep have doubled in numbers the wool production has quadrupled. While the milk cows are almost three times as many their average rate of yield of milk has probably doubled.

The improvement of other cattle, through breeding and feeding, has reduced the time required for maturity and increased the weight of carcass to such an extent that the amount of beef produced annually in proportion to numbers of animals kept is immensely increased. Relative numbers, in comparison with the past, in all kinds of domestic animals, have far less significance than improvement in weight and quality, in thriftiness and early maturity.

It is difficult to force a market abroad for a surplus of any product. Every nation is seeking to produce its own food, and as far as possible its raw materials for extension in all forms of industrial production. The instinct of self-preservation compels the adoption of such a policy. This furnishes the motive for the corn laws of France and Germany and other continental countries and the laws of European nations prohibiting the introduction of our pork products.

We can not sell our crops abroad, as a rule, except to fill the gaps in supply that are made by bad seasons or other results of the inevitable or inexorable. When Senator Sumner once proposed to levy an export tax of 20 cents per pound on tobacco and compel a tribute from foreigners, he was soon convinced by practical tobacco men that its only effect would be to destroy our exportation, and he at once abandoned the idea. The amount grown in Europe and the quantity imported are both regulated by governmental control there, and never by Government or growers here, and under the influence of this regulation the proportion of our crop exported is declining, being reduced slightly below one-half, and nothing that our Government or growers can do will change this fact.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the Chief Clerk to read the title of the pamphlet, so that it can be taken down.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Department of Agriculture. Report of the Statistician. New series. Report No. 71. Report on distribution and consumption of corn and wheat, and on freight rates of transportation companies. Published by authority of the Secretary of Agriculture. March, 1890. Washington: Government Printing Office, 1890.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now open the report and give the date.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

MARCH REPORT.
DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, March 15, 1890.

J. R. DODGE, Statistician.

To Hon. J. M. RUSK, Secretary.

Mr. VEST. I wish to make a personal statement in this connection. I wish to state that on the roll-call when the last vote was taken I inadvertently cast my vote in the affirmative under the impression that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], with whom I was paired, had voted. I thought that I heard him vote and thought I saw him on the other side of the Chamber. It is proper for me to say that I was under that impression at the time.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator's vote did not change the result.

Mr. VEST. It did not change the result at all. If it had done so, I should move a reconsideration. It is due to the Senator from Kansas to say that he would have voted "nay," and that I cast my vote, as I should have done if he had been present, in the affirmative.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like permission to state that I was out of the Chamber for a few moments when the roll was called on the reference of the bill which has been under consideration, and I do not know whether my pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] was announced. I am paired with the senior Senator from Georgia, and if I had been permitted to vote I should have voted against the reference of the bill.

ADMISSION OF WYOMING.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 982) to provide for the admission of the State of Wyoming into the Union, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the bill just received from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. 982) to provide for the admission of the State of Wyoming into the Union, and for other purposes was read twice by its title.

Mr. PLATT. I move that the bill be printed and lie on the table. The motion was agreed to.

DEPRESSION OF AGRICULTURAL INTERESTS.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I simply wish to give notice that on Saturday, in the morning hour and immediately after the morning business is concluded, I shall ask the Senate to take up the resolution of the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], now upon the table, concerning agricultural depression, for the purpose of submitting some remarks.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS AND DEPENDENT RELATIVES.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 389) granting pensions to ex-soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the pending amendment be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 2 of the bill and to insert in lieu thereof:

Sec. 2. That all persons who served three months or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the late war of the rebellion, and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, and who are now or may hereafter be suffering from mental or physical disability, not the result of their own vicious habits, which incapacitates them for the performance of manual labor, shall, upon making due proof of the fact according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed upon the list of invalid pensioners of the United States, and be entitled to receive $12 per month if such disability be total, that is, equivalent to ankylosis of wrist joint, and such pension shall commence from the date of the filing of the application in the Pension Office, after the passage of this act, upon proof that the disability then existed, and shall continue at that rate during the existence of the same in the degree found to then exist; should such disability, however, be found to exist in a less degree than total, such disability shall be pensioned at a relative rate to total, or a relative proportion of $12 per month, except that no rating shall be less than $6 per month: Provided, That persons who are now receiving pensions under existing laws or whose claims are pending in the Pension Office may, by application to the Commissioner of Pensions, in such form as he may prescribe, receive the benefits of this act; and nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent any pensioner thereunder from prosecuting his claim and receiving his pension under any other general or special act: Provided, however, That no person shall receive more than one pension for the same period: And provided further, That rank in the service shall not be considered in application filed under this act.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, it has been some days since this subject was under consideration, and I beg the attention of the Senate while I restate the question.

Under section 2 of the bill, as reported from the Committee on Pensions, there is absolute contrariety of opinion as to what the result will be, either in the total amount to be taken from the Treasury or the effect upon the individual pensioner. Two entirely different opinions have been expressed by members of the Committee on Pensions in regard to its effect. The amendment which I propose has the merit, at least, of being definite and certain of accommodating itself to existing practice in the Pension Office and to the construction put upon existing law by the Secretary of the Interior. Outside of that, my amendment eliminates the dependent provision contained in section 2 of the committee's bill.

I want to say that, independent of anything else, I sincerely hope the Senate will not vote to adopt any section which requires any applicant for a pension to make a pauper declaration. I do not use that term in any specially offensive sense, but I do say it is offensive to a large portion of the men who are entitled to be the beneficiaries of this measure; it is unnecessary; it will be demoralizing, and in the long run will not save a single dollar to the Treasury of the United States. It will set in motion agencies of inquiry, of judgment, of discretion, of comparison which will be just as various as the instrumentalities by which they are decided. The man who in one locality will be held to be without the provisions of the law in another locality will be held to be within them. The line which is drawn between the person who is dependent and the person who is not is shadowy and irregular at the best, and the place where that line should be drawn will depend upon the temper, the disposition, the judgment of the person who draws it. It is absolutely impossible that such a law shall be enforced at any time in the same way as to inclusion and exclusion in all portions of the country. More than that, as this line is shadowy, it would operate today to exclude a man and to-morrow it would be so drawn as to include him.

There would be a great many self-respecting men who would not take advantage of any provision which required them to state that which is untrue. There are a great many more who would not state even the truth in order to get a pension if by so doing they lowered their manhood according to their own conception of what that was. There would then be the spectacle of a large number of people who were entitled by reason of their financial condition to the benefit of the bill who would not receive it, and we should soon witness the spectacle on the other hand of a large number of persons who, according to the construction we put upon it to-day, would not be entitled to the benefits of the bill who would be receiving its benefits.

In my judgment, in the long run the charge upon the Treasury in the one case would be as great as in the other, but with this disadvantage, so far as the bill is concerned, that we should exclude from its beneficial provisions a very considerable number of people whose self-respect would dictate to them that they should not exhibit their financial inability in order to receive a pension. It is introducing a new element into the pension laws. Under no circumstances heretofore has the United States attached as a condition to the receipt of a pension the pauper declaration on the part of the recipient. It was not done in regard to the war of the Revolution, or in regard to the war of 1812, or in regard to the war with Mexico. It is unknown in the laws now upon the statute-book as applicable to the veterans of any war.

It can have no purpose except it be upon the theory that it is to save money to the Treasury. It has no logical foundation other than that of economy, and in my judgment it will not prove a measure of economy, but will prove a measure of vicious distribution. There is no reason why upon the theory which has underlain all the pension laws of the United States, which brings to-day within their beneficent purview every man who was disabled in the line of duty, whatever his financial circumstances may be, we should not continue to apply that rule to those who are disabled, but who, by reason of lapse of time or unfortunate circumstances, are not now able to prove that that disability was incurred in the line of duty. I think that every soldier who is now disabled, who is unable to bear his part in the heat and burden of the day in comparison with his fellows, wrecked, broken, lingering by the wayside on account of physical disability, is entitled to a pension, and I believe that the people of the United States are ready to give it to him. I might say that they were ready to do far more, but I am making what I conceive to be a conservative statement. When we lay as the foundation of the pension laws disability we stand upon solid rock. It is logical, inevitable, necessary, and just, and any other discrimination to be introduced at this late day not only overturns the whole theory of pensions that has existed since the beginning of the entire system, but is discriminating and will lead to infinite trouble, with no corresponding benefit.

Why should we require the disabled soldier to state and to prove that he is unable to support himself? Are we to accept his statement? Not at all. It is to be a matter of proof. The man, then, who can get the most neighbors to testify to his financial inability will get a pension if he chooses to demean himself to the extent of asserting his own inability by making an application. The man who can not thus get favor from his neighbors can not make the proof. At once you will have men deterred from making the application because those who know them best for some reason or other will not make the necessary statements. Others who are better situated will get proof galore; there will be no trouble whatever; and from the beginning of the execution of this proposed law until the last syllable of time it will be a monument of discrimination and a constant enticement to false swearing.

One of two things we ought to do at this juncture: We ought to stand upon the laws as they are, requiring every applicant who has proved that he is disabled to prove that that disability was incurred in the line of duty according to the rules of evidence established by the Pension Office, and require all applicants now entered to do that, or else we should do nothing unless we are prepared to go the furthest step, and, ignoring all question of disability, say that the time has come when every man who served in the Army shall have a pension on account of that service and on account of no other condition whatever.

But this bill proceeds upon the theory that there are a class of persons who are entitled to pensions and who have not yet been able to make the proof required by the present laws, and adding to that this requirement in regard to the pauper declaration will prevent any considerable number of those who are most entitled to it from receiving the benefit until they become demoralized by example and make declarations which are either inconsistent with their self-respect or inconsistent with the truth. We have had enough of that already. It should not be the purpose of the law to invite anything of that kind. It should not be the purpose of the law to draw distinctions which, to sensitive minds at least, are degrading.

One plain distinction constitutes the theory of our pension legislation, and that is disability. The declaration of disability does not shame a sensitive nature. It touches no man's pride. It is honest; it is consistent with honor, with straightforwardness. The recognition of disability as the foundation of pensions is not only just, but it is one of those things which the Government ought not to be willing any longer to drop.

To these propositions in my amendment is added one more, and that is that there shall be no pension granted at less than $6 a month. I am not so tenacious about that particular amount, if it should be urged that it would constitute a discrimination, but there ought to be some limit, because nothing is truer than the declaration made by the late Commissioner of Pensions that a pension of a dollar a month or two dollars a month is too small to be taken into account. It represents nothing substantially of advantage to the recipient, and is a refinement upon this subject which is not only unnecessary, but unjust. If $6 is too much, make it $4. I do not think $6 is too much, but there ought to be some limitation whereby these infinitesimal ratings will disappear.

The amendment, then, is coherent; it is logical; it is based upon a just principle. It recognizes disability as the occasion for the pension and fixes a decent limit for the rate.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas should be adopted, in my opinion it practically amounts to a service-pension bill. The amendment applies to every man who served a certain length of time in the United States Army and who may be suffering from physical or mental disability, not the result of his own vicious habits, which incapacitates him for the performance of manual labor. It does not say to what extent he shall be suffering; it does not define to what extent he shall be incapacitated; but if he is suffering from any disability which incapacitates him in any way for manual labor, then according to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas he is to be put upon the pension-roll.

Every argument that the Senator has made against the original bill in regard to false affidavits, in regard to misconstruction, in regard to one party being put on and another left out owing to the testimony of witnesses as to whether they are incapacitated or not, applies with equal force to the amendment which the Senator himself offers.

If it be the purpose of the Senator from Kansas and of those who act with him to place every soldier who served in the Union Army upon the pension-roll, then I submit that the manly and direct way would be to come forward and take the responsibility of passing a bill of that character, and not seek to do indirectly what they dare not do openly and publicly.

I have been told that during the last campaign, throughout the Northern States, it was promised the Union soldiers that if the Republican party controlled this Congress they should all be placed upon the pension-roll; that the surplus which is in the Treasury was theirs, and they had a right to have it divided amongst them. If that be the purpose, then I ask the Senator from Kansas to come forward and say so in direct terms, and not seek, under the pretense of an amendment for those who are disabled and unable to take care of themselves, to put them all on the pension-roll.

There is no man, I take it, who served in the Union Army, or perhaps but very few, who is to-day under forty-four or forty-five years of age. Bear in mind this amendment does not require that the disability shall have been incurred during the service, but if it exists to-day they will be entitled to a pension, and there are 95 per cent. of them who can come forward and prove that they are to some extent incapacitated for manual labor and suffering under certain disabilities.

If the Senate is ready to pass a bill giving a service pension to the Union soldiers, let it be put in plain and direct words, and do not mislead the people of the country by saying that we are trying to keep the old soldiers out of the poor-house when the object and purpose is to put them all upon the pension-roll.

If this is to be done, I think we ought to hear something about the probable cost of an amendment of this character. Already we are paying between $90,000,000 and $100,000,000 annually for pensions, and still the cry is for more. It was said by the Senator from Minnesota, I think, that some eight hundred thousand soldiers are not yet upon the pension-roll. I want to know where the revenue is to come from, with the enormous expenditures that we are making, if you pass an amendment of this character, which practically puts all upon the pension-roll.

Mr. President, I for one do not believe that is just or fair. I do not believe that the time has come when the soldiers have a right to be quartered upon the other people of the United States of America. While I honor as much as any man the Union soldiers, those who fought for their country and those who were wounded in time of battle, yet there are other citizens whom it is our duty to care for. As was said by the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] a few days ago, distress exists throughout this country among the farming and laboring classes, and we are standing here to-day and having read statements from the Department of Agriculture giving a reason for this distress among the farmers of the country; yet the appropriation goes on under every pretense whatever to increase it from year to year, and the taxes go on, and there is no relief and no diminution.

I am opposed to the original bill, but the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is far worse than the bill reported from the Committee on Pensions. All that I insist upon is that, if it is the purpose of the Senate to put the men on the pension-roll that this amendment would put upon it, it should be done in an open, manly, and direct way, to give them a service pension, and not to pretend that we are providing for those who are unable to take care of themselves, when the real facts are that it provides for all classes, without regard to the amount of wealth they may have or whether they are dependent or liable to go to the almshouses in the country.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, in all the discussion preliminary to legislation here and in other places on the pension question for the last twenty-five years one requisite has stood in the fore-front of everything else, and that was that the dependent, the disabled, and the maimed Union soldiers should first be provided for by means of pension legislation. In the public opinion, in whatever way it has manifested itself, that has been the precedent idea all through. It is that idea upon which our pension legislation has proceeded from 1862 down to the present time, until the Committee on Appropriations of this body are now considering a bill from the other House appropriating $98,000,000 as an estimate for the expenses for the year to come under the pension laws as they now exist.

Under the instruction of that idea the Committee on Pensions, with some experience on this subject, standing in a focus where there is converged upon them, perhaps to a greater extent than upon any other committee or person, public opinion and criticism, have considered patiently and considerately, and with a degree of feeling for the soldier in which I admit no man to exceed the members of that committee, all of these various questions, and particularly the one which has been interposed here by the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Before entering upon an exposition of the bill, which seems to me necessary, owing to the time which has elapsed since it was last up for consideration, I wish to correct one misapprehension, the force and meaning of one word which is continually harped upon here and elsewhere as casting a stigma upon this legislation. It is said that this is a dependent bill, and that is paraphrased by saying that it is a pauper bill, and that as a consequence we should be reluctant to place the soldiers in the attitude of mendicants in their application for a pension.

Mr. President, this bill bears no such construction. This bill does not say by letter, text, or implication that the applicant must be a pauper or a dependent in any sense that implies pauperization. It simply requires, in the language of the bill, that the applicant shall be dependent upon his own labor for support. I have yet to learn that an American citizen who is dependent upon his own labor for support is in any sense a pauper. That is the only phrase in the bill to which the criticisms of the Senator from Kansas are at all applicable, that the laboring man, the honest man for all that, if he is dependent upon his labor for support and has fallen under the influence of a disability which prevents him from employing his labor in sustaining himself and his family, by reason of that dependence upon his labor for support, and not by reason of his dependence upon charity, becomes entitled to a pension. That is the correct explanation of the bill, and I take great pleasure in rescuing it from any such misinterpretation as I have heard here and have seen in the public press.

It is necessary, perhaps, to refresh the recollection of Senators while I give particular attention to the theory of the bill before referring to the remarks of the Senator from Kansas and before criticising his substitute for the second section. As I said the other day, the pension legislation as it now stands and as it has stood for a period of twenty-seven years, requires the disabled soldier who applies for a pension to attribute and trace his disability to his military service and prove that it was incurred by such service. In the lapse of years which has occurred since the close of the war, by reason of the death of comrades, their separation over this vast land, their disappearance from each other, the total severing of ties and communications between most of us who were well acquainted in our little organizations at the time, that mode of proof has become practically difficult, and in nine cases out of ten substantially impossible. So the crying evil in the administration of the pension laws to-day is not as against the justice of the claim, but it is the difficulty of filling the measure of proof which by long established rule has been made necessary to establish a claim.

Acting partly upon that theory, recognizing to its full degree the well known fact that few, if any, who served in the war for any length of time came out as well as they were before, and acting upon a more enlarged idea, however, to which I shall advert in a minute, the bill, as reported by the committee, provides that any person, incapacitated for the performance of labor in such a degree as to render him unable to earn a support and who is depending upon his daily labor for support, shall receive a pension. In other words, the bill provides that the incapacity may be the result of the illness or casualty of a month ago. It ceases to require the soldier to trace by a chain of evidence his present ailment to any disability incurred in the service. In that respect the measure is a just measure. It meets present necessities, according to the experience of the Pension Bureau and of all persons who have had anything to do with the administration of the pension laws.

But it also makes it necessary, prudent, and proper as a matter of business consideration, that a statute which confers a pension by reason of a casualty or an illness which may have happened a month ago, should be restricted to persons who are in absolute and in present need of it by reason of poverty or dependence upon their labor for support. Right here begins the point of divergence between the amendment of the Senator from Kansas and the bill reported by the committee. The bill reported by the committee provides that the man who is dependent upon his labor for support and is incapacitated, no matter when and how, in any degree for earning his support, shall be entitled to a pension. The amendment as proposed by the Senator from Kansas provides that any person now or who may hereafter suffer from mental or physical disability, not the result of his own vicious habits, which incapacitates him for the performance of manual labor, shall, upon making proof of the fact, be placed upon the pension-roll. Whom does that include? It includes everybody who can bring himself within the range of any disability whatever, for the amendment of the Senator from Kansas provides for a grading down from $12 a month for a disability which is total and absolute to that disability which may be so slight as to hardly admit of measurement and yet which is large enough to give a man a pension of $6 a month if he suffers under it.

More than that, while the committee's bill, measuring its justice and liberality by the condition of the men whom it is intended to benefit, does not require these parties to attribute their disease or trace it by evidence to the casualties of military service, the amendment of the Senator from Kansas gives any person who ever served in the Army of the United States for a stated period, no matter how slight the disability, somewhere from $6 to $12 a month, even if he may have an estate of a million dollars, or may be a prosperous farmer, or may be in the possession of a fixed income, and be in no more need of a pension than the most opulent member of the community in which he lives.

Now, that is the distinction between these measures. I am not ready as a Senator or a citizen, in the present state of pension legislation, to go to the extent of pensioning under a disability bill (for I hold that the time for a service-pension bill has not yet arrived) every person who has been a soldier in the Union Army at the rate of somewhere from $6 to $12 a month, irrespective of his dependence upon his labor for his support according to his estate in life.

This is partly a question of sentiment, but is largely a question of business. I submitted estimates here the other day carefully prepared, and I think as accurate as any estimates can be, based upon such shifting data as estimates of this kind necessarily are.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator give that statement briefly again, if he can?

Mr. DAVIS. The restricted bill which we have prepared would make necessary an appropriation, in addition to the one which must come to us under existing law, of $36,000,000 in round numbers. The Senator from Kansas stated on the 1st of March, in his remarks upon his amendment, that from 200,000 to 300,000 men would be benefited by the amendment. I think more than from two to three hundred thousand men of the 800,000 not now on the pension-roll could and would come in under its provision. There can scarcely be any man who has arrived at the years to which he must have arrived if he served in the war of the rebellion who is not under some physical disability which in some degree incapacitates or disables him for labor, and if he is under some degree of such disability which incapacitates him for labor he is entitled to have a graded pension under the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, and the minimum is $6 a month.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator says that his estimate of the cost of the bill which he has reported is $36,000,000. He supplements that by the statement that according to his belief more than 300,000 ex-Union soldiers out of the 800,000 who are not now borne on the pension-rolls will be put on those rolls by means of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. No; by the Senator's amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. By my amendment?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. PLUMB. I thought the Senator was talking about the original bill.

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir. We have then an estimate of $33,000,000, in round numbers, necessary to be appropriated if the bill as it was reported by the committee is passed. If the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas shall prevail, taking his own estimate, taking as an average between $6 and $12 a month, $9 a month, the very lowest that must be averaged according to his estimate submitted here on the 1st of March, the appropriation for these pensions for men who do not need them must be $18,000,000 per annum. In other words, we should add to the $98,000,000 now under consideration the sum of $54,000,000 as matter of annual and current expenditure under pension legislation.

Let us scrutinize the amendment of the Senator from Kansas a little more closely in regard to its practical workings. I have already called the attention of the Senate to the practical operations of the amendment whereby everybody disabled in however slight a degree must be pensioned and can not be pensioned at less than $6 per month. How is it going to work when this system of grading from $12 down to $6 a month is attempted to be applied? Of all the causes of dispute, controversy, decision, appeal, overruling, and coming here for special legislation in the whole pension business, the chief is the difficulty in fixing the grades of pensioners. There were 51,000 cases of original invalid pensions filed last year, and there were over 70,000 applications for increase filed where pensions had been already allowed. We are to be called upon, after pensioning to an enormous amount men who do not need it, when we have all this difficulty imposed upon the pension administration, aggravating it exceedingly beyond what it now is, to ascertain whether a person disabled in any degree less than totally shall have $6, $7, $8, and up to $12 a month.

There is another respect in which this amendment is not as beneficent for the soldier as the bill reported from the committee. The bill reported by the committee provides a pension for any person incapacitated for the performance of labor in such a degree as to render him unable to earn a support, and it gives that man $12 a month. The fact being established that he is incapacitated in such a degree as to disable him from earning a support, he receives $12 a month ipso facto as a liquidated compensation. I say when a man brings himself within the requirements of that provision it is not worth while, it never can be worth while, to attempt to grade and scale him according to the degree of his infirmity. The attempt to do that in the grading of pensions from $2 to $8 has proved one of the most calamitous and distressing failures in any legislation concerning pensions. If a man is disabled and dependent upon his labor for support in such a degree as to disable him from earning a support, then, as in the estimate of damages by a jury where exact accuracy can not be got at, to reach a fair and just sum they set up an arbitrary and a reasonable amount which in any case, while it does not fully compensate a man falling within its provisions, is given to him as a settlement.

How does it work under the amendment of the Senator from Kansas? Under the committee's bill a man may not be totally disabled to get $12 a month, but under the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, in order that any soldier may reach the maximum of $12 per month, he must be totally disabled.

And be entitled to receive $12 per month if such disability be total; that is, equivalent to ankylosis of wrist joint, and such pension shall commence from the date of the filing of the application in the Pension Office, after the passage of this act, upon proof that the disability then existed, and shall continue at that rate during the existence of the same in the degree found to then exist; should such disability, however, be found to exist in a less degree than total, such disability shall be pensioned at a relative rate to total, or a relative proportion of $12 per month, except that no rating shall be less than $6 per month.

So you will find a vast crowd of persons entitled to pensions under one or the other of these provisions, and in the one case, upon a man showing himself unable to earn a support, being incapacitated in such a degree as to entitle him to $12, and in the other case being required to prove a total incapacity from labor, equivalent to ankylosis of the wrist-joint, to obtain that which under any circumstances is very inadequate compensation for a man who falls within either of these provisions. You talk about discrimination, you talk about a sense of justice that will arise as to men making a comparison with each other; the difference between the two propositions is world-wide in favor of the committee's bill.

See how it will work in another instance. Take the case of a man subject to a recurring or intermittent disease, an affection of the eyes that may disable him from labor half a day in every month. By that fact he is unable to earn his support within the large and general meaning of the provisions of the committee's bill. But under the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, although he would be unable to earn his support, he would not be totally disabled, and therefore the rate must be scaled down, perhaps to the minimum pension.

Mr. President, I have in an imperfect way endeavored to compare these measures and to suggest the difference between them, and to state the considerations in favor of the bill prepared by the committee. The bill which the committee has reported is strictly upon the line of a dependent bill, not giving a pension to a man because he is a pauper. Nobody in the committee ever thought of that. That is a misrepresentation and a misconstruction of the language of the bill. It gives it to him because he is in that condition in which nine-tenths of the fellow-citizens of the man who was a Union soldier are; he is dependent upon his own labor for support, not upon charity, not upon the alms of the neighborhood, not upon the hospitality of the poor-house, as has been suggested; but, because he is dependent upon his own labor for support, which disgraces no man in this country, he can come in and have his pension, provided he is disabled, no matter whether his disability was incurred in the service or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the chairman of the committee having the bill in charge to the fact that the committee amendments were adopted only down to section 3. From the commencement of section 3 on through the bill the committee amendments have not yet been acted upon.

Mr. DAVIS. I think it was understood the other day that the amendment of the Senator from Kansas should be brought up before those amendments were acted upon, on the ground that if his amendment should be adopted it would be a substitute for the entire second section. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas if I am not correct.

Mr. PLUMB. I offered my amendment as a substitute for the entire second section.

Mr. DAVIS. That is what I thought.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, the statements of the Senator from Minnesota do not seem to me to be entirely harmonious. He says that the bill as reported by the committee will cost $36,000,000 per annum. He says that the proposition which I have made in the shape of my substitute for section 2 will result in a cost of over $50,000,000 per annum, and yet he says that his proposition is much more liberal than mine. I am willing to be convinced on that point; and until I heard the contrariety of opinion expressed by the members of the committee when this subject was up before I was in a measure persuaded that that might be the case. I do not know now that it will not be the case, because I do not know who will be Commissioner of Pensions. I can conceive it possible to hold under the committee's bill that any one who is disabled in the slightest perceptible degree and who actually labors, as, for instance, upon a farm or in a shop, notwithstanding his labor is not absolutely necessary for his support, might still get $12 a month. I can conceive it possible that a man upon a farm of a thousand acres who labors because he likes to labor, in obedience to the impulse of his faculties, and yet who could live without that labor, might still get his $12 a month if he labored perceptibly. I can conceive that as possible. I can conceive it possible also that under the construction to be put upon this bill, and which could not be said to be a violent one, the man who is totally dependent upon his daily labor—that is to say, having no other thing in the world that in any way contributed to his support except the labor of his hands, and who was absolutely bereft of everything else, and whose failure to support himself was the result of disability—would be the only man who would receive the benefit. In the one case the bill would put upon the pension-roll probably 300,000 or 400,000 men. In the other case it might not put upon the pension-roll 50,000 men. No one knows how the bill is going to be construed. I will venture to say that there would be bound to be two opposite opinions upon it in every assemblage of men. I do not believe any man could nearly tell how the bill would be construed by some future Commissioner of Pensions.

I want to make the measure definite. I want to give to the man who is getting $8 a month now on account of what is called total disability, being a disability equal to ankylosis of the wrist-joint, $12 a month. I want to give to the man who is disabled below that an amount ratably down to $6 a month. I prefer that because, in the first place, it can not be doubted what that means precisely. Every element in it has been a subject of construction under the present and past administrations of the Pension Office. No question of a financial condition which may be conceived, no question of a financial condition which may be exaggerated, will ever come in but the one question, and the only question will be the degree of disability, and that is to be settled, as it must necessarily be, as it is now, by a medical examination held for the purpose.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] appears to be somewhat at variance with the Senator from Minnesota. He says that my amendment is in effect a service-pension bill. That only shows that the Senator did not read the amendment. It gives no pension except for disability, and unless the Senator is prepared to state that all the men who were in the Union Army are disabled, then it is in no sense a service-pension bill.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. I said that it does not specify the amount of disability that shall be required, and that of the men who served in the Army 95 per cent. at least can prove to-day that they are more or less incapacitated by reason of ill-health, age, and otherwise, and practically that they can all prove enough to put themselves upon the pension-roll under the Senator's amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. Very well. Then, if that be true, there is a construction under which they can go upon the pension-roll under the bill of the committee as well. I do not object to the Senator's characterization of my amendment as being practically a service pension. If it shall be shown that all these men are disabled, then all will be entitled to the benefits of the measure. But it fixes a rating of $12 a month for disability thoroughly well understood and recognized now in the practice of the office as pensionable under the existing law at $8 a month, and grades from that down to $6 a month.

But, Mr. President, the reproach of the Senator from Arkansas is not enough to deter me from presenting this matter. He seemed to think that it was designed not candidly, but uncandidly, not to be exactly what it appeared to be on its surface, but something else, and a covert way of redeeming a pledge which he says somebody made on the stump. I will acquit him from having made any such pledge on the stump. He, at least, will have no occasion to take anything back.

I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota if he is entirely certain that the language which is in the bill of the committee means total dependence upon daily labor or only partial dependence? I should like to have the committee polled and put the construction of that committee into the RECORD, in order that it may go along with the passage of the law, so that if it be passed we shall know what it means. If I could believe it was one way I might support it. If I believed it was the other way I should not support it. I want, as far as possible, precision, nobody to be cheated, and no reproach to fall upon this body, either by the general public or by the beneficiaries of the bill, that something was passed which the Senate did not understand the purport of.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I shall only submit a few remarks in explanation of the position which I have taken upon this bill as a member of the Committee on Pensions. It fell to my lot to be assigned, as representing the minority upon that committee, as one of the subcommittee to consider several bills that were then before the committee in reference to dependent pensions. In the performance of that duty the subcommittee took into consideration all the several bills before them, and adopted as the groundwork of the bill which they concluded to report the bill introduced by the Senator from Minnesota, adding to it such amendments as are found in the bill in italics.

The basis of my action on that bill may be very briefly stated. In the first place, the pension laws of the United States are exceedingly liberal and fair. In the examination of the questions suggested by the several bills before the committee we were induced to look with favor upon the appeal made to Congress by this class of veterans. We found from our experience in that committee that hundreds of cases were coming before the Bureau of Pensions in which it was impossible to show that the disability originated in the line of duty because of some technical defect in the proof as to the origin of the disability, although the proof of disability was clear. For this reason the pension was rejected.

Having heretofore provided by law for all the cases of those who suffered from a disability by reason of injuries or disease incurred in the line of duty, the next proposition that commanded the attention of the committee was the bill making provision for those men who had sacrificed as much for their country and who had suffered as many hardships in the line of duty as those who were receiving pensions from the Treasury of the United States, but who, because of the technical question of not being able to trace the disability as having been incurred in the line of duty, were deprived of this meager support or assistance given by the Government.

Mr. President, the committee, as stated by the chairman, did not believe the time had yet arrived when a service pension would be proper, but they were of opinion that it was the duty of the Government, acting on behalf of the people of this country, to take care of those soldiers who are suffering equal disability with those who are now being pensioned, but who could not furnish satisfactory proof to the Pension Bureau in tracing the disability to an injury incurred in the line of duty. The committee, with this view, formulated this bill, with its limitations.

All such legislation is necessarily indefinite. It must rest at last on the construction given to its general terms by the Commissioner of Pensions.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas is equally indefinite. The provision of the bill is:

Suffering from mental or physical disability, not the result of their own vicious habits, which incapacitates them for the performance of labor—

Instead of "manual labor," with this limitation and direction to the Commissioner in the construction of that language—

In such a degree as to render them unable to earn a support, and who are dependent upon their daily labor for support.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas desires to know what is the construction of each member of the committee of this particular language. I do not mean to say that when the Pension Bureau comes to construe these terms it will require an absolute and total incapacity to be shown before allowing the pension. I do not think that the language admits of that construction; but in order to pension a person under this language it will be necessary for the Commissioner of Pensions to be satisfied that the incapacity from the performance of labor is of such a degree that the person applying for a pension is not in a condition either by manual or mental labor to earn a support. If the claimant is so affected by the disability which exists that he can not earn a support "and is dependent upon his daily labor for support," under the evidence presented to the Bureau the pension attaches and the Commissioner is constrained to allow it. That is my construction of the language employed by the bill in its description of the conditions which will entitle the applicant to a pension.

The affirmative decisions of these two questions are essential before the pension can be allowed. But, Mr. President, who would have thought that any Senator upon this floor or any citizen in this country would have construed the terms used in this bill as placing the pension applicant in the position of a pauper? Sir, the right he derives under this bill is the same right he would derive under any pension law of the United States. It is derived from the implied contract that when he enlisted in the service of the Government for the purposes of its protection the Government impliedly agreed that if injured or disabled in its service he should have a reasonable recompense or compensation for the injury suffered. Not a full compensation, not a complete indemnity for the injury suffered and sacrifices made for his country, because, sir, it would be an absolute impossibility for any government to do that, but it was impliedly agreed that he should, if disabled, be given a reasonable, fair, legitimate compensation as a recompense for the disabilities which he had incurred. It is not placing him in the attitude of a pauper nor in the attitude of a person claiming a charity, as I understand the proposed law or the present pension laws of the United States. It is the execution of the implied contract upon the part of the Government, made with its citizens who enlisted for its defense, that a reasonable and fair compensation would be paid in the form of pensions to those disabled in its service.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator state the degree of dependence he thinks to be necessary to enable a person to get $12 a month under this bill?

Mr. FAULKNER. I could best illustrate that by saying that I would not suppose, for example, that the Senator from Kansas would apply.

Mr. PLUMB. I am not talking about who will apply. I am talking about the application of the word "dependent" to the men who shall apply.

Mr. FAULKNER. I presume that the language "dependent upon their daily labor for support" (the word "manual" having been struck out by the committee) would apply to any one who was engaged in either mental or physical occupation and who depended on his daily labor for his support. For example, the Rothschilds of our country, the Cresuses, who have an unbounded amount of wealth, who may have served their country and perhaps may have suffered some disability, would not come within the purview of the provisions of the bill, but any man who is dependent upon his daily labor, either mental or physical, for his support would come fairly within its provisions if his incapacity was such "as to render him unable to earn a support."

Mr. PLUMB. Can the Senator say what he thinks about the degree of dependence, if he is willing to get a little closer than the Rothschilds in this matter?

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not see that there is any degree about it. I do not see that it admits of the question of degree when it comes to that. It is that he is dependent upon his daily labor, either mental or physical, for his support. That fact being proven, the pension attaches at once, the other conditions having been shown.

In the language of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, "which incapacitates them for the performance of manual labor," I object to the word "manual," as I did in the original bill. I see no reason why if a man is disabled the Government should not give him a pension although he is a person who earns his living with his brain instead of his hand, if he can not earn a support by reason of the disability which affects that mental capacity the same as in the case where he is earning his support by manual labor.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator will see that the question of support in my amendment is not involved in the question of manual labor at all. That is merely a description. A person is to be incapacitated for the performance of manual labor. That is the general description of his physical condition, and in the succeeding lines it is stated exactly how that disability shall be rated. If it is equal to anchylosis of the wrist-joint, it is to be compensated for at the rate of $12 per month, and if below that, then as a matter of course it is to have a lower rating down to $6 per month, but it is not involved in the question as to whether that inability to do manual labor disqualifies a person from earning a support or makes him dependent in any sense.

Mr. FAULKNER. But I will ask the Senator whether his amendment does not exclude from the benefit any one who is incapacitated who does not earn his support by manual labor?

Mr. PLUMB. Not at all.

Mr. FAULKNER. Why does it not?

Mr. PLUMB. Because it does not. It provides simply as to physical incapacity, but it does not relate to what a man may be doing. He may be doing mental labor and yet be disabled physically to the equivalent of anchylosis of the wrist-joint, and no matter what he is doing he gets his pension.

Mr. FAULKNER. Suppose he is disabled by reason of mental disability, and not physical disability?

Mr. PLUMB. It is so stated.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator distinguishes between mental and manual, because the use of the word "manual" must have some meaning, and it can only be as drawing a distinction between mental and manual.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator will see that in the preceding lines the word "mental" is used. If he will look at line 5, he will find the provision is that, if the person is suffering from mental or physical disability which disqualifies him to a certain extent, then he is entitled to the benefit of the proposed act.

Mr. FAULKNER. But under this amendment, I hold, the applicant would have to show, first, that he is suffering from mental or physical disability and, second, that it incapacitates him for manual labor. Now, I say that a man may be engaged in an occupation by which he earns a livelihood while he himself would not be actually engaged in manual labor.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator is so tenacious about the word "manual," I will consent that it be stricken out. I am glad to get together with him on that point.

Mr. FAULKNER. The committee struck it out for that reason from their bill. I did not hear the Senator's last remark.

Mr. PLUMB. I say I am very glad to get together with the Senator upon that point.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator from Kansas is with me on that point, and he could have been with me from the first if he had supported the bill of the committee, because the committee had that language stricken off the original bill.

Mr. PLUMB. It is not what the committee struck out, but what I inserted that I object to.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I believe I have nothing more to refer to in the remarks of the Senator from Kansas, but I felt that it was my duty to myself and to the committee to repudiate the idea which had been thrown out by the Senator from Kansas that the bill placed any soldier who comes within the purview of its provisions in the position of a pauper, that is, I mean, a pauper in the sense that he is receiving a charity from the United States Government, to which he has no legal or moral claim except—

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, the Senator can not put me in a false position in that way. It is not the character of the obligation to which I referred. I agree with him that this is the discharge of an obligation on the part of the Government to the soldier. It is the character in which the Government puts him in order that he may receive what he is entitled to that I object to. It puts him in the attitude of a suppliant and of making what a large majority of men, I fear, a great many of them, I know, will believe to be a degrading admission. I have just been in another capacity investigating a question about the propriety of the purchase of school books by a local government, and it is stated upon the documents in that case that parents who are now entitled to receive books upon making the statement that they are not able to buy them shrink from making that declaration, although they are unable to buy them, and sometimes even keep their children out of school rather than make the declaration that they are not able to buy the school books.

In this case the applicant has to declare that he is incapacitated to perform manual labor in such a degree as to render him unable to support himself, and further that he is dependent upon his daily labor for support, the very declaration which, according to the superintendent of schools of this city, hundreds of parents must make in order to receive school-books for the benefit of their children.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the Senator from Kansas whether any difficulty has heretofore been found in inducing persons to make application because of that sensitiveness to which he alludes under existing laws which require similar proof.

Mr. PLUMB. There is no such provision in any existing law.

Mr. FAULKNER. Not as to the soldier, but as to the dependent parents.

Mr. PLUMB. That is an entirely different question.

Mr. FAULKNER. They have no rights except such as come through the soldier, and yet there has been no sensitiveness in introducing proof of dependency both before the bureau and before the committees of Congress. I will state further, for the information of the Senator from Kansas, that in a number of bills which have been before the Committee on Pensions, of which I have been a member for three years, for relief in cases not reached by existing laws, but which are so meritorious that the appeal to the legislative discretion of Congress is entertained and the case treated as exceptional, yet the committee uniformly requires the most complete proof of the necessity for the donation from the Government, as in such cases there is no legal claim upon the Treasury.

Mr. PLUMB. That marks the whole difference in these two cases. In one case there is a contract, at any rate a fairly implied obligation, which the Government can not shirk, as it has no desire to do. The other is something which the Government gives as an endowment, practically as a gift, a recognition, of course, of the moral obligation growing out of the service of a son, but in the other case the party himself is entitled to it. We all agree to that, and yet you propose in the bill to require him to make these declarations as to his financial inability and his dependence of a character which would highly offend many who are not oversensitive.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will ask the Senator from Kansas whether he understands that the implied obligation on the part of the Government to furnish a reasonable and fair pension extends further than to the payment of a reasonable and fair pension to one who was disabled in the line of duty and in the service of his country.

Mr. PLUMB. That depends. In the first place, this bill only says in substance, and my amendment only says in substance, that we give the man the benefit of the presumption that he was disabled in the line of duty.

Mr. FAULKNER. I beg pardon; the bill does not go upon any such theory. There is no presumption about it, but the proof of disability, not the result of his own vicious habits, entitles him to a pension if the other conditions are shown.

Mr. PLUMB. But the Senator himself in his very succinct statement at the outset of his speech said he had ascertained, what we all know, that there was an abundance of cases where the party was undoubtedly disabled in the line of duty, but could not make the technical proof. The law now proposes to step in and merely give him the benefit of the presumption, and while undoubtedly in its sweeping character it will embrace some others, at the same time only a small percentage, no doubt in such a way that there will be only exceptions enough to prove the rule. This, therefore, proceeds upon the theory of obligation, and if it does not then the Senator's idea of contract entirely disappears and he might as well apply "gift" to this class of pensions as to the pensions of dependent parents.

Mr. FAULKNER. No, I never applied the term "gift" to dependent parents. I applied the term "gift" to those persons who applied for pensions and whose cases were so meritorious that for reasons satisfactory to Congress the appeal was entertained and their prayer granted, although there existed no law justifying the bureau in granting a pension. These cases being exceptions, the committees and Congress have always required the proof of dependence as a prerequisite to favorable action.

Mr. President, the war ended twenty-five years ago. Most of the men who were in the service were men between twenty-one and forty to fifty years of age. We recognize the fact that owing to the time which has elapsed since the war they have aged and become enfeebled, not in the case of the Senator from Kansas perhaps, because he was a young man when he went into the service, but in the majority of cases; consequently disabilities which have been gradually increasing from 1866 on to this time are beginning to be seriously felt. Congress is justified in taking the position that, although the disability from which those parties are suffering can not be traced directly to the service and as having been incurred in the line of duty, the fact that the hardship they endured and the suffering incident to the service must necessarily produce their effect on the physical system gives a firm support to the assumption that that disability has resulted from that service, and under this bill we propose to give them the benefit of that presumption and allow them a reasonable pension upon making proof that they "are dependent upon their daily labor for support."

Then the bill meets another very urgent demand that has been made here, and which appeals strongly to every citizen of the United States: that men who have sacrificed their health in the service of their country should remain no longer in the poor-houses of our counties. There are twenty-odd thousand of those men, and their appeal for relief touches a responsive chord in the heart of every patriotic American citizen to relieve them from the conditions and disabilities which attach to their receiving assistance from their respective counties, and a just public sentiment demands that they be furnished an amount that will enable them to leave such houses and by economy live comfortably the balance of their lives.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I have concurred in the provisions of this bill. I am frank to say that I do it with pleasure, and I do not hesitate to indorse it as framed by this committee. One or two provisions other than those I have alluded to were a little broader than I should have cared to formulate, because I did not think the obligation on the part of the Government was as great in those cases as it is under the second section to those affected by it, but in all other respects I approve of the bill.

Mr. McPHERSON. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill in the nature of a substitute for the second section, which I should like to have printed. Assuming, as I do, that no final action will be reached by the Senate this evening upon the bill, I should like to have the amendment printed in order that it may be considered in due time.

Mr. DAVIS. What is the amendment?

Mr. McPHERSON. I will state for the information of the Senate the theory upon which my amendment proceeds.

Mr. CULLOM. Let it be read.

Mr. McPHERSON. Very well, let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to substitute for the second section of the bill:

That all persons who served three months or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the late war of the rebellion and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, and who are now or may hereafter be suffering from mental or physical disability, not the result of their own vicious habits, which incapacitates them from the performance of labor in such a degree as to render them unable to earn a support, and who are dependent upon their daily labor for support, shall, upon making due proof of the fact according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed upon the list of invalid pensioners of the United States and be entitled to receive $12 per month if such disability be total; that is, equivalent to anchylosis of the wrist joint; and said pension is hereby made divisible upon that basis for any less degree of disability than total, in which case such disability shall be pensioned at a relative proportion of $12 per month, except that no rating shall be less than $6 per month.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, I have expressed a desire since this debate began to have some bill prepared and submitted to the Senate for which I could vote. I have repeatedly heard the question asked of the honorable Senator who has charge of the bill before the Senate as to his own interpretation respecting the amount of disability which would be necessary in order to enable an applicant for a pension to receive $12 per month under this bill. I have noticed in all cases when these questions were asked him that he has refrained from giving his opinion; he has been entirely speechless. I have further noticed, however, that no less than four members of the Committee on Pensions have expressed their opinion that it made no difference whatever as to the measure of disability with which the applicant was affected, he would be entitled to receive under this bill $12 per month. Now, sir, I object to that.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator did not understand that my answer was to that effect?

Mr. McPHERSON. I did not hear the first of the Senator's remark, but I do remember that as he closed his remarks he gave his express sanction to the bill reported by the committee. Am I correct?

Mr. FAULKNER. Yes.

Mr. McPHERSON. Very well. Now, take the case of a person who has borne the burdens and heat of the day, who has been in the midst of the conflict, who has suffered disability by wounds or by sickness, and who is to-day totally disabled, who has stood before the door of the Pension Office for the past fifteen or twenty years asking for relief. Under the law the Pension Department has been unable to give him the relief because he was not able to make the necessary proofs by which under the law the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Pensions could grant him relief. I am informed that there are 200,000 of those cases now upon the list, not upon the pension-rolls, but upon the list begging for pensions. Of that number hundreds and thousands are totally disabled. I am not willing that a man who has dodged under a band-wagon during the fight, who has skulked away, who has been a deserter, if you please, shall come in to-day because of his disability from any cause, whatever it may be, and get the same pension that is to be given to the men whom I have described. It is very difficult to distinguish whether the disability that afflicts a man to-day is not resulting more or less from his own vicious habits, and I take it that the Commissioner of Pensions would hardly take the trouble to ascertain whether the applicant met the full requirements of this bill or not, but would grant him a pension.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the Senator from New Jersey to yield to me a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. McPHERSON. I yield.

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not understand the Senator when he says that under this bill a deserter would be pensioned. If a deserter is an honorably discharged soldier, then I could understand him, but that has not been my understanding of an honorably discharged soldier.

Mr. McPHERSON. There have been plenty of soldiers who have been restored, who have been given a discharge since the war, who were not honorably discharged at the close of it. Then I will withdraw the word "deserter." There were plenty of soldiers who skulked in the war and did not perform their duty. That is known to everybody. I do not suppose that it is at all any new subject.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the Senator to yield to me again.

Mr. McPHERSON. Certainly.

Mr. FAULKNER. Even admitting those cases in which the person has been restored by reason of a special act of Congress or by the general law which gave the Secretary of War that authority, was it not for good and satisfactory reasons that the technical charge of desertion made against those men was removed?

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not refer to what took place subsequently at all. Everybody knows that those who went into the conflict suffered, as a matter of course, far more than those who kept out of it. Take a man who is totally disabled under the construction of the law as to-day construed by the Pension Bureau. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas fixes the limit of total disability at anchylosis of the wrist-joint. Very well; we will call that total disability. Now, my amendment proceeds to give that man a pension of $12 per month, and as to all disability less than total disability it grades him down to $6 a month. If, under the committee's bill, a soldier who has performed any service whatever is perceptibly injured to such an extent that he can not earn a full support, he is entitled to $12 a month.

I want to ask the Senator from West Virginia and the chairman of the committee, who has charge of this bill, if there is any justice or equity in pensioning one soldier who is only perceptibly injured at $12 per month while you give to the man who is totally disabled but $12 per month? There is a distinction drawn between the two men, and you call it a dependent-pension bill. You make no measure of dependence in the bill whatever. A man who is able to earn four-fifths of a support, to state it in that way, is to get from the Government under this bill exactly as much as the man who is totally disabled and who can earn nothing. Is that the principle upon which you propose to base pension legislation and call it fair?

Mr. FAULKNER. It is not the principle upon which we propose to base pension legislation generally. The Senator from New Jersey can see from this bill that the person is not rated according to his disability. That is, a total disability under the general laws is much greater and larger in its monthly payments than $12 a month. If a person totally disabled could, under some of the general laws, show that he was injured or incurred the disease in the line of duty he would be receiving $75 a month, but in this case he would only receive $12 a month. It was because it was a case in which the Government had let up upon the severe rules of evidence required in the other law that it could put them all upon the same plane of $12 a month.

Mr. McPHERSON. Very well, Mr. President. Now I understand the Senator's position exactly. The Pension Department can pension nobody who can not make the necessary proof under the law, and therefore, as I say, 200,000 applicants have been prevented from getting any pension at all. Then why does not the Congress of the United States constitute itself into a court of equity, as it has the power to do? Let us take up these individual cases and grant pensions in proportion to the measure of disability upon the proof that the applicant is able to give. If the applicant fails to make it appear to the Pension Department that he is entitled to a pension, let him appear with such proofs as he can make before the Pension Committee, and let him get good and full justice in his case. There would be no merit in the bill, I submit to the Senator from West Virginia, if there were not some pensioners for the same amount of disability receiving more than $12 per month; but certainly you have no right to strike a balance as between justice and injustice and fix the rate of one man at $12 per month while another, who is not entitled, either by law or equity, to the bounty of this Government at all is to receive the same sum.

My amendment proposes to grade the disability between $12 a month and $6 a month in proportion to the limit of disability. I retain all the features of the committee's bill, all the phraseology. All the proofs that the committee require, I require in my amendment. I fix a limit, which is total disability, as required by the Pension Department to-day, fixing the maximum limit at $12 a month. Then I grade it from $12 a month down to $6, and I say there is a sufficient limit by which justice and equity can be done to each and every individual applicant for a pension. I am not willing that there should be any such invidious work done by Congress with respect to pensions. A whole mass of people have applied for years, as I said before, who have stood at the door of the Pension Department unable to make the necessary proofs that the department and the law required; but they were able, thousands of them, to come here before this body and the body at the other end of this Capitol and convince Congress that there was proof enough and testimony enough to entitle them to pensions, and they have been placed upon the pension-roll by order of Congress.

I want to know if there is any justice or fairness on the part of the committee in regard to a man who has fought through the war, who has suffered wounds and sickness and distress. Is that man to stand upon the pension-rolls of this country upon the same level exactly with the man who, perhaps only a part of the time, you may say for only three months, was in the Army? Hundreds and thousands and tens of thousands of three-months men who went out never saw an engagement. But after twenty-five years have elapsed, and with all that may arise incident to the destruction of health and strength and power to earn a support, they come here and under the committee's bill they are to receive just as much pension as the man who could not get it from the Department who suffered for four long years in the war. I should think that the soldier himself would feel that the Congress of the United States had treated him very badly. I do not believe that there is a soldier in this country disabled either to a greater or lesser degree who would not say to-day that that is a most unjust and unprincipled way of dealing with this great subject.

Therefore, Mr. President, I have offered my amendment, which I should like to have printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from New Jersey to formally offer the amendment now?

Mr. McPHERSON. I offer it as a substitute for the second section of the bill, only upon the idea that the committee would not expect the vote to be taken to-night upon the bill and that it might be printed and go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment already pending to section 2, and the Chair supposes the Senator from New Jersey offers his as an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. McPHERSON. Yes, sir; I do. The Chair, I suppose, is referring to the substitute of the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, the substitute of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. McPHERSON. Then I offer mine as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. President, I shall occupy the attention of the Senate but a few moments. I understand that the chairman of the committee who has charge of the bill is desirous of having the question upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] disposed of before we adjourn, but I trust that I shall be permitted to say that I am unwilling to be put in the attitude, or that the Pension Committee shall be put in the attitude, of differing with the Senator from Kansas upon the substantial purpose which we all have in view.

There are, generally speaking, three great classes into which the ex-soldiers are divided, so far as pensions are concerned. First, those who incurred disability during their service or by reason of the service. Second, those who are unable to support themselves through some disability acquired since the service or in the service which can not be established as having been incurred. Third, the great mass of the soldiers who are neither needy nor have suffered any disability. The first class have been pensioned. The present laws provide for the pensioning of those who incurred disability in the service without regard to their necessities, without regard to their condition in life, and without regard to their estate. Nobody can question the propriety of that. People will not differ with reference to such a policy. The next class, those who are suffering from disability, and also are necessities, are the ones who are attempted to be provided for in this bill. They are not necessities to the extent of being subject to be branded offensively as paupers, by any manner of means, but they are those who, through the vicissitudes of life, through the age which is creeping upon them, or through other means, have become unable to support themselves by the labor upon which they are dependent for support. The third class, the great mass of legislators and people of this country I apprehend are not ready to pension. That would involve simply a service pension. Some of us are willing to go to the extent of granting at once a service pension covering every case. I have declared heretofore in the discussion upon this bill that I am willing to go to that extent.

I believe that the resources of this country will be found to sustain such a provision; but I am willing to yield my judgment, to yield my action, to those who have had these long and distinguished years of experience in the Congress of the nation. I am willing to accept the views of those men who believe that such a measure will not meet with universal public commendation.

Then the next proposition, if that can not be adopted as the policy, is to pension the second class. The committee has undertaken to do it in this bill. I believe, and the committee believe, that it would meet with universal commendation; that it would meet with the approval of the country if those soldiers who are dependent upon their labor and who can not perform that labor should receive at least the sum fixed by the committee as an aid and assistance to them, as a partial compensation to them for the services which they have rendered.

Now, the distinguished Senator from Kansas interposes this amendment, one that the committee has had under careful consideration, and it seems to me the only essential differences between his amendment and the section proposed by the committee are simply these:

First. He, like the committee, proposes a measure of disability, but he proposes to have the relative disability determined by the Bureau of Pensions. The committee came to the conclusion, as has been so well stated by the chairman, that, in view of the fact that this same clause, or a very similar one, has been the very, perhaps the greatest vexation in the administration of the pension laws, that rule should be abrogated, and not adopted in this bill; that there should be no determination of the relative degree of disability, but, that, if the disability existed, no matter to what degree, so that it incapacitated a man from earning his own support, the soldier should be rated at the sum in the bill provided for as the minimum and the maximum, to wit, $12 per month.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator will please not forget that there is another condition that he must not overlook, and that is, that not only disability but dependence must be shown.

Mr. MOODY. I was about to speak of the second point of difference. The first point I have spoken of. The question of disability is left alike in the Senator's amendment and in the bill of the committee. Disability is requisite in both, and any degree of disability in the committee's bill, no matter what it may be, entitles the pensioner to $12 a month, of course coupled with the other condition, and the Senator's amendment undertakes to determine the scale of disability. He scales the soldier down to $6 a month. The committee thought that not wise.

The second point of difference is this: The Senator's amendment undertakes to give to the soldier, without regard to his necessities, this pension. That was the subject of careful consideration by the committee, and the committee unanimously concluded that at this stage in pension legislation in Congress it was not wise, at least upon a bill of this character, to go to the extent of pensioning every man who had been a soldier and who was suffering from disability, no matter what might be his condition in life, his income from other sources, or his estate.

Senators may conclude that under this amendment of the Senator from Kansas wealthy men will not apply. That has not been the rule under former pension legislation. The exceptions are very rare under other legislation where ex-soldiers have refused a pension, no matter what might be their estate, if the law entitled them to it. What has been the rule heretofore we may presume will be the rule hereafter. If the Senator is ready to go to the extent of pensioning an ex-soldier, no matter what may be his estate, no matter what may be his income, no matter what may be his condition in life, who did not receive his disabilities in the service or by reason of it, then let him so declare. If the Senate is prepared to go to that extent, I agree with other Senators who have spoken on the subject, the manly way to do is to sweep away all question of proof, except the fact of service and honorable discharge, and give to each and every one a service pension.

No, Mr. President, the idea of the committee, as I have said before, was to first reach those who are in such circumstances as that they needed this compensation from the Government. It is not a gift; it is not a bounty even; it is but a partial compensation for the services they have rendered. Let us adhere to that proposition so far as this bill is concerned or let us sweep it aside and go to the full extent that I have indicated, and declare that the obligation of the Government is not discharged until every man who has served three months or more and been honorably discharged shall receive this partial compensation.

Mr. President, I want to say that there is a justification by the bravest and best of the ex-soldiers of the Union Army for those who are opposed to the passage of a service-pension bill at this time. In my own State the commander-in-chief of the soldiers' organization has recently addressed an assemblage of the Grand Army and he advises them in that speech, and he has in speeches made in other States of the Union, that it is not wise for the soldier element now to ask the passage of a service-pension bill, but he commends the bill which is before the Senate to them and to the country and advises them that it is the proper legislation that ought to be effected by Congress at this time.

Mr. President, I beg the pardon of the Chair and of the Senate for occupying the time of the Senate at this late hour in the day as long as I have. I hope we shall get a vote on the amendment.

Mr. McPHERSON (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.). Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from New Jersey?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON] offered an amendment as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. McPHERSON. I should like to have the amendment again reported, in order that the Senate may thoroughly understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again reported. The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. McPHERSON, as follows:

That all persons who served three months or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the late war of the rebellion, and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, and who are now or may hereafter be suffering from mental or physical disability, not the result of their own vicious habits, which incapacitates them from the performance of labor in such a degree as to render them unable to earn a support, and who are dependent upon their daily labor for support, shall, upon making due proof of the fact according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed upon the list of invalid pensioners of the United States, and be entitled to receive $12 per month, if such disability be total, that is, equivalent to anchylosis of the wrist-joint; and said pension is hereby made divisible upon that basis for any less degree of disability than total, in which case such disability shall be pensioned at a relative proportion of $12 per month, except that no rating shall be less than $6 per month.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLUMB. Is it in order to move to amend section 2?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendments have not yet been acted upon in section 3 and the following sections.

Mr. PLUMB. I want to strike out some of the propositions inserted by the committee, together with some portions of the original text of the bill.

Mr. PLATT. Why not go through with the committee amendments to the bill first?

Mr. PLUMB. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendments have been agreed to up to section 3. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, in section 3, line 1, after the word "any," to strike out the words "invalid pensioner" and insert "officer or enlisted man who served three months or more in the Army or Navy of the United States during the late war of the rebellion, and who was honorably discharged;" in line 7, after the word "father," to insert the words "as such dependency is defined under section 1 of this act;" in line 10, after the word "established," to insert the words "for them;" in line 11, before the word "without," to strike out the words "for widows, minor children, and parents;" in line 12, after the word "such," to strike out the word "pension" and insert the words "officer or enlisted man: Provided, That the cause of death of such officer or enlisted man was not or is not due to a violation of the civil or military laws, or the result of vicious habits, and;" in line 17, after the word "this," to strike out the words "or any other general law" and to insert the word "act;" and in line 19, after the word "widows," to strike out the word "respectively;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That if any officer or enlisted man who served three months or more in the Army or Navy of the United States during the late war of the rebellion, and who was honorably discharged, has died, or shall hereafter die, leaving a widow, minor child or children under eighteen years of age, or, in case there be no widow or minor child or children, a dependent mother or father, as such dependency is defined under section 1 of this act, such widow, minor child or children, or mother, or father, shall be placed upon the pension-roll at the rates established for them by law, without regard to the cause of death of such officer or enlisted man: Provided, That the cause of death of such officer or enlisted man was not or is not due to a violation of the civil or military laws, or the result of vicious habits, and that said widow was married to the deceased pensioner prior to the passage of this act. All pensions granted to widows under this act shall take effect from the date of the death of the husbands of such widows, but dating back of the passage of this act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 20, before the word "That," to insert the words "Sec. 4;" after the word "That" to insert "from the date of the passage of this act;" and in line 3, before the word "dollars," to strike out the word "five" and insert "four;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That from the date of the passage of this act the increase of pensions for minor children shall be at the rate of $4 per month instead of $2 per month as now provided by law, and in case a minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise helpless, the pension shall continue during the life of said child, or during the period of such disability.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out sections 4, 5, and 6, as follows:

Sec. 4. That any agent, attorney, or other person instrumental in prosecuting any claim under section 2 or 3 of this act who shall, directly or indirectly, contract for, demand, receive, or retain, for his services or instrumentality in presenting and prosecuting such claim, a sum greater than $10 (payable only upon the order of the Commissioner of Pensions, by the pension agent making payment of the pension allowed), or who shall wrongfully withhold from a pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of the pension or claim allowed and due such pensioner or claimant, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for every such offense, be fined not exceeding $500 or imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Sec. 5. That section 4716 of the Revised Statutes is hereby modified so that the same shall not apply to this act: Provided, That this act shall not apply to those persons under political disabilities. And no person shall be pensioned under this act for any disability incurred while engaged in any military or naval service against the United States.

Sec. 6. That all laws and parts of laws which conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

Sec. 5. That no agent, attorney, or other person engaged in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting any claim under the provisions of this act shall, directly or indirectly, contract for, demand, receive, or retain for such services in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting such claim a sum greater than $10, which sum shall be payable only upon the order of the Commissioner of Pensions, by the pension agent making payment of the pension allowed, and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section, or who shall wrongfully withhold from a pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of a pension or claim allowed or due such pensioner or claimant under this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every such offense, be fined not exceeding $500, or be imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to add what I send to the Secretary's desk as section 6.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as a new section:

That section 2 of the act of March 3, 1879, chapter 187, entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of the arrears of pensions granted by act of Congress approved January 25, 1879, and for other purposes," be, and the same hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"Sec. 2. That all pensions which have been or which may hereafter be granted in consequence of death occurring from a cause which originated in the service since the 4th of March, 1861, or in consequence of wounds or injuries received or disease contracted since that date, shall commence from the death or discharge of the person on whose account the claim has been or is hereafter granted, if the disability occurred prior to discharge, and if such disability occurred after the discharge, then from the date of actual disability, or from the termination of the right of the party having prior title to such pension; and in the consideration of any and all claims for pensions in consequence of death from, or disability resulting from, disease contracted in the service during the late civil war the person on whose account the said pension is claimed shall be conclusively presumed to have been sound and free from disease at the date of entering the service.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 28, 1890, at 12 o'clock m.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 28, 1890.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

VISITORS TO NAVAL ACADEMY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair, under authority of existing law, appoints the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] as members of the Board of Visitors to attend the annual examination at the Naval Academy.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in further response to the resolution of March 3, 1890, additional information in regard to the added membership of the Sac and Fox Indians, and requesting that when the Senate has concluded its inquiry into the subject it will return the papers transmitted; which was read, and ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In accordance with the request of the Secretary, the accompanying papers referred to will be returned to the Department of the Interior after examination by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of 94 educators of the country, praying for the passage of the international copyright bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. INGALLS presented a petition of citizens of Topeka, Kans., members of the Bricklayers and Masons' International Union, praying for an amendment of the laws so that none but citizens of the United States shall be employed upon Government works; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented two petitions of citizens of Washington, D. C., praying for the opening and paving of Fifteenth street east; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented petitions of Bob McCook Post, No. 31, and Live Eagle Post, No. 197, Department of Nebraska, Grand Army of the Republic, praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 496, to remove the limitation in the payment of arrears of pensions; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of 20 citizens of Valeda, Kans., praying for the free coinage of silver; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BERRY. I present a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas, in favor of an appropriation for a harbor on the northwest coast of the Gulf of Mexico, which I ask to have read, and move, as the bill on that subject has been reported, that it lie on the table.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table; as follows:

Whereas it is of vital importance to all that vast region of our country lying west of the Mississippi River and the commercial and naval advantages of our country generally demand a permanent deep-water port on the northwest coast of the Gulf of Mexico: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That our Senators and our Representatives in Congress be most earnestly requested to use their best efforts to procure, as early as possible, a permanent available appropriation of the amount necessary to secure a deep-water port on the northwest coast of the Gulf of Mexico, capable of admitting the largest vessels, and at which the best and most accessible harbor can be secured and maintained, and to do all else necessary to accomplish the desired end.

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE, Little Rock, Ark.

I, B. B. Chism, secretary of state of Arkansas, do hereby certify that the annexed pages contain a true, complete, and full copy of house concurrent resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas, approved January 23, 1889, as appears by comparing the same with the original roll of said concurrent resolution now on file in this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal, at Little Rock, this 21st day of March, A. D. 1890.

B. B. CHISM, Secretary of State,
H. B. ARMISTEAD, Deputy.

Mr. FAULKNER presented resolutions of the Capital City Assembly, 6194, Knights of Labor, of Charleston, W. Va., signed by William A. Gilleland, master-workman, and Sim Iron, recording secretary, in favor of the establishment of a system of postal telegraph; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented resolutions of the Pickaway Farmers' Alliance, of Monroe County, West Virginia, signed by L. A. Houston, secretary, in favor of the "subtreasury plan;" which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VOORHEES presented memorials of the Monthly Meetings of Friends of Wayne and Grant Counties, in the State of Indiana, remonstrating against the expenditure of large sums of money for an increase of the Navy and coast defenses; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON presented a resolution adopted by the Philadelphia (Pa.) Board of Trade, favoring the passage of a bill granting a pension to Mrs. Caroline Huddell White, widow of the late Commodore George B. White, United States Navy, of $50 per month; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Reading, Pa., praying for the passage of a bill prohibiting Sunday work; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Pittsburgh, Pa., remonstrating against the passage of any bill regarding the observance of the Sabbath or Lord's Day; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of 34 voters of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the free coinage of silver; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of subordinate lodges of the Bricklayers and Masons' International Union, of Uniontown, Beaver Falls, Connellsville, Pittsburgh, Franklin, Lancaster, Washington, Butler, Greenville, Altoona, and Williamsport, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying that only citizens of the United States be employed on public works; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. ALLEN. I present a petition and resolutions unanimously adopted at the regular meeting of Stevens' Post, No. 1, Department of Washington, Grand Army of the Republic, of Seattle, Wash., setting forth that the soldiers and sailors of the war for the preservation of the Union should receive the substantial and merited recognition of the Government in being granted service pension, and praying the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Washington to advocate a bill giving to every soldier, sailor, and marine who served in the Army or Navy of the United States between April, 1861, and July, 1865, a period of sixty days or more, a service pension of $8 per month, and to all who served a period exceeding eight hundred days an additional amount of one cent per month for each day's such additional service; also favoring the passage of a bill placing the widows of Union soldiers and marines on the pension-rolls without regard to the time of service or the cause of soldier's death.

I move that the petition and resolutions be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN presented a petition of the Bricklayers and Masons' International Union No. 1, of Grand Rapids, Mich., praying for an amendment of the laws so as to provide for the employment of none but citizens of the United States on Government buildings, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. MANDERSON presented a petition of the board of supervisors of Platte County, Nebraska, in favor of a deep-water harbor at Galveston, Tex.; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BUTLER. I present memorials of C. Fitzsimmons, manager of the Southern Cotton Oil Company; Hon. Johnson Hagood, chairman of the State board of agriculture of South Carolina; Hon. A. P. Butler, commissioner of agriculture of South Carolina; Hon. E. T. Stackhouse, president of the South Carolina State Farmers' Alliance; Hon. E. R. McIver, president of the South Carolina Agricultural and Mechanical Society, and resolutions of the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce, remonstrating against the passage of what is known as the compound-lard bill.

I also present memorials from John Ferguson, a prominent and leading business man of Greenville, S. C.; Frank Hammond, president of the People's Bank and a prominent business man of Greenville, S. C., and Finlay Brothers, of Greenville, S. C., on the same subject.

I move the reference of these memorials to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER presented a memorial of the American Meter Company and various other corporations and companies, indorsed by Seth Phelps and Thomas Smith, of Kingstree, S. C., remonstrating against an increase of duty on tin-plate; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BATE presented a petition of the Bricklayers and Masons' International Union of America, of Memphis, Tenn., praying for such an amendment of the laws that none but citizens of the United States shall be employed on public works; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE presented a petition of the Bricklayers and Masons' International Union of America, of Grand Rapids, Mich., praying for such an amendment of the laws that only American citizens shall be employed on public works; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. DANIEL presented a petition of 38 citizens of York County, Virginia, and a petition of 11 citizens of Loudoun County, Virginia, praying for the free coinage of silver; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Bricklayers and Masons' International Union of America, of Richmond, Va., signed by Master Duke, president, B. L. Ragland, secretary, praying that none but citizens of the United States be allowed to labor on Government works; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. VEST presented a petition of the Bricklayers and Masons' International Union, of Kansas City, Mo., praying for legislation giving a preference to native-born mechanics and contractors in building Government structures and on public works; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of 96 citizens of Harrison County, Missouri, praying for the free coinage of silver; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SQUIRE. I present a petition of the Legislature of the State of Washington, praying for defensive works on Puget Sound, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Commerce and printed in the RECORD.

Mr. DOLPH. I call the attention of the Senator from Washington to the fact that the Committee on Commerce has not jurisdiction of the subject named in the petition, which refers to coast defenses, and should be referred to the committee on that subject.

Mr. SQUIRE. Very well; I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses and printed in the RECORD.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, STATE OF WASHINGTON,
Office of the Secretary of State.

I, Allen Weir, secretary of state of the State of Washington and custodian of the seal of said State, do hereby certify that I have carefully compared the attached instrument of writing, i. e., senate joint memorial No. 20, praying for defensive works on Puget Sound, with the original now on file in my office, and that the same is a correct transcript therefrom and of the whole of said original.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said State, at Olympia, this 17th day of February, A. D. 1890.

[SEAL.] ALLEN WEIR, Secretary of State.

[Senate joint memorial No. 20, praying the Congress of the United States for the erection and armament of defensive works on Puget Sound.]

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States: We, your memorialist, the Legislature of the State of Washington, would respectfully represent:

That since the Government of the United States secured possession of the territory of which a portion is now the State of Washington, including the shores of Puget Sound and the southern shore of the Strait of Fuca, no steps whatever have been taken by the United States to defend these shores from a hostile fleet in case of war, and that there is not now, nor has there been at any time, a single defensive work nor a single gun in position for such defense. The shores of Puget Sound are now the sites of large and growing cities and the terminal points of great transcontinental and coast railroads. The tonnage of foreign and domestic vessels engaged in transportation to and from these points is great and growing. The presence of great supplies of timber, coal, and iron ore has led to a rapid increase of population, industry, and wealth. A site for a navy-yard has been selected, and the resources of the country are such as to invite the establishment of furnaces and foundries capable of producing the material for defensive works and their armament.

And we would further respectfully represent that there is at Esquimalt, in British Columbia, within eight hours' steaming of the head of navigation on Puget Sound, a strong naval station of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, at which there is maintained a fleet of war vessels which, in the event of hostilities occurring with that power during the present defenseless condition of this State, could paralyze the industries of this region, cut off our communications by sea, and lay under contribution the cities of Puget Sound. The Government of Great Britain has taken steps to defend its naval station by formidable works in its vicinity, and we respectfully and earnestly urge upon your consideration the necessity of adequate and speedy provision for the defenses of Puget Sound.

And we further respectfully invite your attention to the statements in relation to our necessities contained in the annual report for the year 1889 of Brig. Gen. Nelson A. Miles, United States Army, commanding the Division of the Pacific, and to the recommendations therein contained, in which we concur.

And your memorialist will ever pray.

Passed the senate January 16, 1890.

CHAS. E. LAUGHTON,
President of the Senate.

J. W. FEIGHAN,
Speaker of the House.

Passed the house January 31, 1890.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1904) to provide for railroad crossings in the Indian Territory, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2675) to authorize the Kansas and Arkansas Valley Railway to construct and operate additional lines of railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3116) to punish the carrying or selling of deadly or dangerous weapons within the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2688) providing for the erection of a building for the Central Dispensary and Emergency Hospital in the city of Washington, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2590) to incorporate the Cable Railway Company, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2601) to change the route of the Rock Creek Railway Company, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. WALTHALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted reports to accompany the following bills heretofore reported by him:

A bill (H. R. 389) to construct a road to the national cemetery at Port Hudson, La.; and

A bill (S. 3050) to provide for the purchase of a site for a military post near Eagle Pass, Tex., and for the construction of suitable buildings thereon.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3043) to amend and further extend the benefits of the act approved February 8, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the allotment of land in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States over the Indians, and for other purposes," reported it with amendments.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 678) to provide for a building for the use of the post-office, the office of the superintendent of the Hot Springs reservation, a room for a free reading-room and library, and other civil offices in the city of Hot Springs, Ark., reported it with an amendment.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 943) making an appropriation for the establishment of a military post in the interior of Alaska, and for the exploration and survey of the valley of the Yukon River, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2553) to remove the charge of desertion and of having enlisted in the Confederate service from the records of the War Department standing against John McFarland, and to grant him an honorable discharge, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2532) for the relief of William H. Atkins, formerly commissary-sergeant, United States Army, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

HENRY ZELL.

Mr. WALTHALL. I move that the bill (S. 2095) to place Henry Zell on the retired-list of the Army be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FRYE (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3293) to amend the act entitled "An act to prevent the importation of adulterated and spurious teas," approved March 2, 1883; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 3313) granting a pension to D. B. Bross; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 68) directing the Secretary of the Interior to report to Congress all proceedings by his Department in pursuance of the treaty with the Pottawatomie Indians ratified April 26, 1866, as modified by subsequent treaties; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. CAMERON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DANIEL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 8393) to provide for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus by holding an international exhibition of arts, industries, manufactures, and the product of the soil, mine, and sea in the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Quadro-Centennial, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF GRAND RIVER.

Mr. McMILLAN submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Whereas the citizens of Grand Rapids, Mich., have caused a survey to be made of Grand River, between Grand Rapids and Grand Haven on Lake Michigan, at their expense and under the direction of the Board of Trade of said city; Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause an examination to be made of this survey, and be directed to report both as to the practicability of improving Grand River and an estimate of the cost thereof for a channel with sufficient depth to accommodate the commerce of the lakes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will not do, Mr. President, because neither one of the Houses can go into an examination through the War Department of the state of a river. That requires a joint resolution, whether it involves expense or not. Calling on the Secretary of War for any information in his possession is one thing; but directing or requesting him to make an investigation and survey of a river is quite out of the line of safe precedent for one House to undertake to do. I have not the least objection to the thing, but I object to the way of doing it.

Mr. McMILLAN. The survey has already been made by the citizens. The resolution simply refers to a survey for the use of the Department. The survey has been made at the expense of the citizens.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the resolution go over for the time being. I think by putting it into the form of calling for information the Senate can get at what he wants.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over.

RECALL OF A BILL FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. TELLER. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to return to the Senate Senate bill 1332, entitled "An act granting to the city of Colorado Springs, in the State of Colorado, certain lands therein described, for water reservoirs."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that a bill which has passed Congress and gone to the President?

Mr. TELLER. It has gone to the President.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am rather inclined to think that it ought to be "Resolved by the Senate, the House of Representatives concurring," as bills go to the President by a committee of both Houses.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say to the Senator that while that has been the common rule I have a precedent for this, and the bill must be either signed or vetoed to-morrow if it is not recalled. There is quite a serious error in it that can be corrected in a moment, and I would rather have the resolution go through in this shape. I find that Presidents have returned bills on just such resolutions.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask that the resolution may be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not right.

Mr. TELLER. I find a precedent for it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection to the present consideration of the resolution, the question is on agreeing to it.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER subsequently said: At the suggestion of several Senators who think that the adoption of a resolution of the kind that I have just had passed might introduce a precedent which might trouble us hereafter, although I find a precedent for it in the last Congress, I should like to call up the resolution which has just been passed and have it made a concurrent resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be back at the desk in a moment.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Colorado. The question is new to me, though I suppose it is familiar to other Senators. What is the constitutional effect of presenting a bill to the President and then nothing happening within ten days except the return of the bill to one or the other House, without objection on the part of the President? The Constitution is:

Every bill . . . shall, before it become a law, be presented to the President of the United States.

That has happened in this case.

If he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his objections, etc.

If any bill shall not be returned by the President within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him—

That of course is the constitutional return, I suppose, with his objections—the same shall be a law.

I do not state this by way of objection, the Senator will understand, but I think the matter is of interest enough to have him state his view about it.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know about that. It seems to me that if we pass a bill and send it to the President and then both Houses recall it, of course it goes back to the hands of the proper House as if it had never been sent. That is the way it strikes me. I can see the difficulty of allowing one House to do that without the other, although here is a precedent where we did it on an important bill during the last Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. I concur entirely with the Senator, but I wish to make a suggestion. As a matter of course, if either House (because the bill must pass both Houses) expresses a desire to reconsider in order to correct a mistake, for that reason the President would immediately, within the ten days, return the bill, and it would be brought here in five minutes. I think the resolution as it stands, upon going to the President, would at once justify him to cause the return of the bill, and it ought to do so.

Mr. TELLER. I find that on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] in the last Congress it was

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 3640) to amend sections * * * of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia.

Then I find that the President returned it and said:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 18th instant, I return herewith the bill, S. 3640, etc.

It is suggested that there is danger of creating a precedent here that will trouble us. As the bill was passed nem. con. I suppose no one will object to the proper correction. If any Senator thinks it ought to be made a concurrent resolution, of course I do not feel that I ought to insist upon the resolution standing as it was adopted. I know that the resolution will undoubtedly bring the bill back, as it stands, because that has been done heretofore, but I submit the matter to the Senate. It will be easier and more agreeable for me to have it stand as it is, but if Senators think it is a bad precedent I must take the trouble of trying to get a concurrent resolution through the other House between this time and to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the resolution now reconsidered and before the Senate?

Mr. TELLER. I ask that the vote may be reconsidered, so that the resolution may be fairly before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be regarded as agreed to, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, I move to amend the opening part of the resolution, so as to read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring).

I am sure that it will not take ten minutes at the other end to dispose of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to observe, without interposing any objection, that I do not see why one House can not do this alone if both together can do it. If we take the letter of the Constitution nothing can happen after a bill has been constitutionally presented to the President, as this has been, except the President shall sign it, shall return it with his objections, or, in the absence of that, it shall become a law within ten days. Those three things are expressly provided for in the Constitution; and this proceeding is a departure from the strict letter of the Constitution, but undoubtedly sanctioned by precedent and necessary for the safe transaction of the public business. But it must be in the nature of a reconsideration by the Senate after the time fixed by the rule. Of course we can make a rule by which, instead of having one day to reconsider bills, we can have twenty days or thirty days. In the absence of such a rule we can reconsider a bill by unanimous consent after the expiration of the day, or two days, whatever the time is for entering the motion; and if the bill comes back here it is to be treated as a bill which has been lawfully reconsidered. It seems to me that is the only theory on which this proceeding can be supported, and if it is supported on that theory the Senate has a right to do it without the concurrence of the other House. So I respectfully submit, without interposing further against the Senator's desire, that either this thing can not be done at all, or, if it can be done, as I suppose the precedent is settled that it can, as I believe it can, it may be done by the Senate alone.

Mr. TELLER. I will state that the Official Reporter, who is very well posted in these matters, tells me it has been done many and many a time by concurrent resolution, and I find that it has also been done at least once by a resolution of the Senate alone. I have no doubt a simple Senate resolution would bring the bill back, but several Senators, after the resolution was passed, thought it was an unwise thing, creating a precedent that might be troublesome hereafter, and I did not desire to have it done, and therefore I consented that the resolution might be taken up and considered again. If the Senator from Vermont insists upon the amendment, I must submit to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it is indispensable for safety.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to state a circumstance which happened some years ago when General Grant was President. A bill relating to an interest in my State was passed by both Houses and went to the President for his approval. He disapproved the bill and sent it back with his veto. I went to him afterwards and suggested that he make a request to the Senate to return to him the bill, as it had been vetoed under a misapprehension as to the features of the bill or the effect of certain provisions thereof. The President, being satisfied on a careful re-examination of the bill that it ought not to have been vetoed, sent a written request to the Senate to return the vetoed bill to him for a reconsideration on his part. When that request was presented to the Senate the consensus of opinion then by the lawyers of the Senate, particularly those who were on the Judiciary Committee, was that the Executive had exhausted his powers by the veto, and that there was no authority on the part of the President to make that request of the Senate and no authority in the Senate to return the bill.

I do not know what bearing that historical fact may have upon this question. It is simply the reverse of the present situation. If the President could not withdraw a bill under such circumstances, after he had exhausted his executive power by his veto, the question is whether in a case exactly the reverse of it Congress could properly make such a demand upon the Executive, its legislative power having been exhausted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I will only take a minute of the time of the Senate.

When a bill, whether a Senate or a House bill, has passed the two Houses and has been signed by the presiding officer of each House it becomes just as much the property, if you can use such a phrase, just as much the proposition, the bill of one House, as it does of the other, because it has then become their united and formal action, acting as a Congress. Then the two Houses, through their respective committees, usually a Joint Committee on Enrolled Bills, present that bill to the President of the United States. Suppose, while he is considering it, one House, without the knowledge of the other, recalls it. The last knowledge the other has is the entry on its Journal that it has been presented to the President. One House calls it back. The Journal of the other House, therefore, would never show what had become of that bill. The records of the State Department of the expiration of the ten days without a Presidential signature would show nothing; and this would leave the business of the Government, in the way of reconsideration after both Houses had finally acted, in an entirely dangerous way, and in a time of stress and excitement (as there is not now about this matter of course) and difference of opinion, with small majorities in either House in passing some bill that excited great public interest, it might be extremely dangerous.

I believe it is intrinsically against the right of the other House in this case, as reciprocally it would be if it had been a House bill, for one body to send for the bill without the concurrence of the other, for it is their joint act.

I do not think the case referred to by my friend from Nebraska applies to this, for there the act, so far as the President was concerned and so far as final action upon the bill was concerned, had been a complete and final constitutional act of his; but until he shall have signed the bill, within the ten days, the process, the matter is still open, if both Houses wish to again reconsider it, and I think the practice of a hundred years has settled that.

Therefore, this being now a concurrent resolution, I do not think there is the least objection to passing it.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Vermont that I think perhaps this might be reached by another method. It is a little difficult to get a concurrent resolution through the other House, especially on private-bill day, which is to-day. This is a matter of mere form, which does not amount to anything, and yet I should not like to ask the President to sign a bill that conveys 480 acres more land than the bill on its face purported to convey, which was by an error in inserting "and" where the word should have been "of," and that is all of it. Although the land is of no practical value, being 11,000 feet above the level of the sea, it might look as if there was some little advantage being taken of it, and I would not like to do that. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Vermont whether I could not reach this by moving to reconsider, if I could get unanimous consent?

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the Senate can not act on the bill until it gets it back. If the Senator would enter a motion to reconsider, I should not object to his doing so.

Mr. TELLER. If I make the motion by unanimous consent, then would not a resolution of the Senate to bring back the bill be in order?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the resolution is in order now.

Mr. TELLER. The resolution as the Senator has moved to amend it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes. I have not the least objection to entering a motion now to reconsider by unanimous consent, but the Senator can have unanimous consent at any time, whether two days have gone or not. However, the right of the two Houses concurring to respectfully request the President of the United States to return a bill that he has not yet signed, about which a mistake is found to have been made, I am sure must exist.

Mr. TELLER. I would not want to establish any improper rule, and I am greatly impressed by the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont that it ought to be done by the action of both Houses. Therefore I will consent to the amendment, and I will undertake to get the resolution through the other House if I can.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It can be got through in ten minutes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Several SENATORS. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution as proposed to be amended will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be, and is hereby, requested to return to the Senate Senate bill 1332, entitled "An act granting to the city of Colorado Springs, in the State of Colorado, certain lands therein described, for water reservoirs."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

EXCLUSION OF CHINESE LABORERS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to transmit to the Senate a statement of the number of arrivals and departures of Chinese persons at the port of San Francisco, monthly and annually, since the 2d of August, 1882; and that he further transmit any information in his possession respecting the evasion or violation of the laws now in force for the exclusion of Chinese laborers from the territory of the United States, and respecting the neglect or failure of duty of any officer of the United States under said laws.

SENATORS FROM MONTANA.

Mr. HOAR. I move that 1,500 additional copies of the reports of the majority and minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the Montana contested-election case be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I give notice that, unless the pension bill which is now pending as the unfinished business be completed this week, I shall not ask the Senate to take up the Montana contested-election case until Tuesday next. I do not mean by that to be understood that I shall not call it up on Monday if the pension bill be entirely completed; but I shall consult the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] about that and follow his convenience. I shall not, however, call the election case up on Monday unless the pension bill be out of the way by that time.

ORDER OF BUSINESS FOR SATURDAY.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If there are no further resolutions to be offered, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. INGALLS. Before the motion of the Senator from Vermont is submitted, I beg to suggest that I have heard an intimation that there was some understanding or agreement by which, in case the Senate should sit to-morrow, the Calendar, under Rule VIII, was to be alone considered. I ask for information, in order that Senators may be fully advised whether that be the understanding or not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is not aware of any such agreement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think it improper to state that at a conference of my political friends, and I hope the political friends of the gentlemen on the other side (for we are all friends here), in order to get on with the public business it was thought best—and some of the gentlemen on the other side have been spoken with about it—that the unfinished business, the great measures like the one we had up yesterday and the one which is now on the Calendar as the unfinished business, should be taken up every day immediately after the routine morning business, instead of giving the hour or two that the rules provide for to the Calendar, under Rule VIII; but in order that the Calendar, under Rule VIII, the small affairs of local interest and of private justice, etc., that make up the mass of matters treated of under Rule VIII, should not be left out of sight, therefore the best thing to do was to devote every Saturday entirely and exclusively to business that could be considered under Rule VIII all day long, giving that one day of the week to clearing up the Calendar of the small matters of local interest all over the United States, and of private justice and pensions and all that sort of thing. Therefore, I should hope that the Senate all around would think that that was a wise and right way to get on more rapidly with business than in any other way. So, sitting to-morrow, as I trust we shall, I should hope that the Senate would devote itself exclusively to the Calendar, under Rule VIII.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I have been desiring for some days to submit some remarks upon the subject of the prevailing depression of the agricultural interests; in other words, on the tariff. I did not interpose my remarks upon the discussion of the trust bill, which I might have done if the bill had not been suddenly referred. I do not much like to ask the indulgence of the Senate, when the pension bill is under discussion, to hear me for an hour; and yesterday I gave notice that to-morrow morning, immediately after the routine business, I should ask the Senate to take up the resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], for the purpose of enabling me to submit some remarks. I should very much dislike to do a thing that the Senate would consider to be a violation of any understanding or of any rule of the Senate. I should, however, very much like to be indulged, as it is important to me, and I hope to my constituents, that what I have to submit upon that question should be submitted at an early day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am sure, if I may make a remark, that if to-morrow when we commence to go on, or at any time when we are going on with the Calendar under Rule VIII, the Senator from Oregon should ask the Senate to hear him upon the subject he has named, he would get unanimous consent for it without the slightest doubt.

Mr. DOLPH. That is satisfactory. I did not like to be precluded so that if I should make the motion to-morrow it would be regarded as violating the understanding.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent—and I am very sure the Senate will be glad to hear the Senator from Oregon—that at the conclusion of his remarks upon the pending resolution of the Senator from Indiana, the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Calendar under Rule VIII, and that no other business be considered until the Senate shall adjourn on that day—to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had yesterday approved and signed the act (S. 140) to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases from one State to another, and for the punishment of certain offenses.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate to print the proceedings and final act of the International Marine Conference and the report thereon by the United States delegates.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate requesting the President to return to the Senate the enrolled bill (S. 1332) granting to the city of Colorado Springs, in the State of Colorado, certain lands therein described for water reservoirs.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 5739) increasing the pension of Sophia Schimmelfennig, widow of Alexander Schimmelfennig, late brigadier-general and major-general by brevet; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 127) to print the eulogies upon William D. Kelley.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I renew my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After four hours and fifty-four minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, March 29, 1890, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 28, 1890.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

APPROVAL OF THE JOURNAL.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Wednesday, March 26.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I desire to raise the point that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER having ascertained by count that there were 168 members present, the Clerk read the Journal.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, before the Journal is approved I desire to have the Clerk read that part of it which shows the disposition made of the bill for the admission of the State of Idaho into the Union. The report went in under Rule XIII, and the Clerk, I believe, does not usually read the part of the Journal which covers proceedings under that rule; at all events he has not read it this morning, and I want to know what the Journal shows upon that point.

The SPEAKER. The entry will be read as soon as the Clerk can find it.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the Clerk is not prepared to read that part of the Journal at this moment, I will ask the Speaker to state whether the report of the action of the House in regard to the Idaho bill, as found on page 2753 of the RECORD, is the same as what is contained in the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that what is printed in the RECORD is a correct transcript of what appears in the Journal.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I desire to know, Mr. Speaker, by what authority this order was made:

That said bill, together with the said views of the minority, be recommitted to the Committee on Territories.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not seen that.

Mr. SPRINGER. That statement is made in the RECORD at the top of page 2753.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is a mistake of practice there, but will examine the question, and the entry will not be considered as approved until examination has been made.

Mr. SPRINGER. Allow that to pass, then, for the present.

The SPEAKER. Certainly. The question will be reserved without prejudice. This is a matter of which the Chair had no cognizance.

Mr. MANSUR. Mr. Speaker, I will state for the information of the House that there having been a kind of a quasi-understanding that the case of Idaho was to follow immediately after that of Wyoming, and my minority report not being yet printed, I went to see the Journal clerk, Mr. Smith, and asked him what would be proper, and, after he had talked with me, I suggested that he send for the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE] or the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. DORSEY], in charge of the majority report. Accordingly we sent out for Mr. DORSEY, and he and I agreed that both reports should be sent down for printing and that the proper order should be made; leaving it, as I understood, to Mr. Smith to make the proper order, because I really did not understand exactly what would be the proper order under the circumstances. We left the entry, therefore, to him, but it was done with the full understanding and approval of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. DORSEY] and myself, representing the majority report and the minority report.

The SPEAKER. Without stating a definite opinion upon the question, the impression of the Chair is that such business must be transacted in the presence of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. That was the point I desired to make.

The SPEAKER. The two rules taken together are not absolutely definite, and but for the question of the reservation of points of order it might be held that either method could be adopted with regard to such bills; but the question of reservation of points of order presents so many difficulties that the Chair would not undertake to decide that way at present.

Mr. MANSUR. I desire to say that I am willing to share equally with my friend from Nebraska [Mr. DORSEY] the responsibility in this matter, entirely relieving the clerk, who did nothing except what we approved.

The SPEAKER. The matter might be settled now by unanimous consent—

Mr. DORSEY. The Chair will allow me to say it was understood that the Idaho bill should not be considered reported, but should remain in charge of the committee; that was the understanding with the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD], but he was anxious to have the majority report printed with the minority report—

The SPEAKER. It was done simply with a view to the printing of the report?

Mr. DORSEY. Yes, sir, for his convenience, so as to have the report printed.

Mr. SPRINGER. The report of the majority of the committee was not printed by order of the House.

Mr. DORSEY. There was no order by the House for printing either report.

The SPEAKER. Precisely. Is there objection to printing and recommending the report of the committee, together with the views of the minority? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. If there be no further correction, the Journal will be regarded as approved. In the absence of objection, that order is made.

Mr. CRISP. I would like to understand the decision of the Chair upon the order of recommitment as it appears in the Journal. Of course, I understand that the question of printing and recommitment is now settled by unanimous consent. But the action stated in the Journal seems to have been taken under the second clause of Rule XIII; and therefore, as a matter of practice, the question being new, I would like to know what the determination of the Chair was.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought that for recommitment some action on the part of the House must take place.

Mr. CRISP. Then that action will not appear in the Journal as having been taken without the direct order of the House.

The SPEAKER. It will not; it will simply appear as having been done by unanimous consent this morning.

CORRECTION.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to correct the RECORD. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER], in his closing five-minute speech yesterday, said:

Following the record made during ten years of consistent opposition to the Dakotas, he has had himself written up as being their firmest friend. In the Magazine of Poetry he is already embalmed in history as the one person entitled to all credit for the admission of the four States last admitted. Hear what he has procured to be said of himself.

That is what I understand the gentleman to say, but I said at the time that the statement of the gentleman that I had procured this article to be published was not true. The reporter—

The SPEAKER. This hardly appears to be a correction of the RECORD.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir; it is. My statement should have gone in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's statement is omitted?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir; it is omitted from the RECORD. I desire the RECORD to show that I said at the time what I say now, that the statement that I had procured the publication of this article myself was untrue. The reporter has stated to me that he was sitting near the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] at the time, and did not hear my remark, but gentlemen all around me heard it. I desire my statement to appear, and I reiterate it.

Mr. BAKER. That is all right.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to submit to the House some proposed changes of reference.

There being no objection,

The Committee on Indian Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of a memorial requesting legislation upon the subject of claims arising from Indian depredations; and the same was referred to the Committee on Indian Depredations.

The Committee on Printing was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 567) to continue the publication of the supplement to the Revised Statutes; and the same was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

OWNERS, ETC., OF BRITISH BARK CHANCE.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Committee of the Whole House will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2234) for the relief of the owners, officers, and crew of the British bark Chance; and the bill will be laid on the table, a Senate bill similar in substance having passed the House.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ALLEGHENY, PA.

Mr. BAYNE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2402) to provide for the purchase of a site and erection of a public building thereon at Allegheny, in the State of Pennsylvania.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. Before that question is put, I ask that the report may be read.

Mr. KILGORE. I would like to know how large an expenditure this bill involves.

Mr. BAYNE. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. ROGERS. I think we had better have the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

PRINTING OF EULOGIES ON HON. WILLIAM D. KELLEY.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to make a privileged report. The Committee on Printing has directed me to report back with an amendment the joint resolution (H. R. 127) to print the eulogies upon William D. Kelley.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there be printed of the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late William D. Kelley, a Representative in the Fifty-first Congress from the State of Pennsylvania, 25,000 copies, of which 6,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 19,000 copies shall be for the use of the House of Representatives; and the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to have printed a portrait of the said William D. Kelley to accompany said eulogies, and for the purpose of engraving and printing said portrait the sum of $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. That, of the quota to the House of Representatives, the Public Printer shall set apart fifty copies, which he shall have bound in full morocco, with gilt edges, the same to be delivered when completed to the family of the deceased.

The report of the committee was as follows:

The committee have considered the House joint resolution No. 127, to print the eulogies upon William D. Kelley, and report the same to the House with the recommendation that it do pass with an amendment striking out the words "five hundred" in line 12 and inserting in lieu thereof the words "one thousand."

The estimated cost of printing said eulogies is the sum of $10,375. The cost of printing the said portrait is the sum of $1,000.

The amendment reported by the committee, to strike out "five hundred" in line 12 and insert in lieu thereof "one thousand," was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed. Mr. RICHARDSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON ALCOHOLIC LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. STIVERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Printing. I am directed by the committee to report back with favorable recommendation the resolution I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic be authorized to have printed, in pamphlet form, 1,000 copies of the hearings now being held before that committee.

The resolution was adopted.

PRINTING PROCEEDINGS INTERNATIONAL MARINE CONFERENCE.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back the concurrent resolution which I send to the desk, and recommend its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized to have the proceedings and final act of the International Marine Conference, and the report thereon by the United States delegates, printed and bound at the Congressional Printing Office, and that in addition to the usual number there shall be 2,000 extra copies for the use of the Senate and 4,000 for the use of the House of Representatives; for the use of the Department of State 1,300, for the use of the Treasury 600, and for the use of the Navy Department 500 copies.

The resolution was considered and adopted.

Mr. RUSSELL. I ask that the report on the resolution be printed in the RECORD.

The report of the committee is as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the Senate concurrent resolution to print the proceedings and final act of the International Marine Conference, have given consideration to the same, and report back the resolution recommending its adoption. In a letter addressed to the Senate Committee on Printing the Secretary of State says:

"As showing the need of expedition in the printing, I have to inform you that the foreign delegates can not make their reports to their own governments until they shall have received copies thereof from this Government. I shall therefore thank you to take such steps in the premises as will enable this Department to furnish copies to the foreign delegates at the earliest practicable moment."

The estimated cost of printing the number of copies designated in the resolution is $11,338.50.

POST-OFFICE INSPECTORS AND SPECIAL AGENTS.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am directed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to report back, with certain amendments, the resolution I send to the desk, and recommend its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Postmaster-General of the United States is authorized under the provisions of existing laws to appoint such post-office inspectors and such special agents as the good of the service and the safety of the mail may require; and

Whereas such post-office inspectors and special agents are allowed a stated salary, and also a per diem allowance for incidental and traveling expenses while actually employed in the service; and

Whereas it is currently reported that the present Postmaster-General has been employing the time of such post-office inspectors and special agents in investigating the claims of contending Republican applicants for appointment as postmasters, and paying for such services out of the public funds; and

Whereas such practices are contrary to the laws of the land, subversive of good government, and such outlays of the public moneys wholly unauthorized; Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish as speedily as practicable to the House of Representatives a statement of what post-office inspectors or special agents, if any, have been employed or directed to investigate the standing and claims of rival applicants for appointments as postmasters, and, if so, when, where, and in what cases reports have been made by such inspectors or special agents, either under the direction of said Postmaster-General or by any officer of the Department under his control, and what amount of money or moneys have been paid out of the public funds for the salaries of such post-office inspectors and special agents while employed as heretofore mentioned, and the amount of per diem so paid such employes.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendments:

In line 19 of the engrossed copy of the resolution, after the word "Whereas," insert the words "it is alleged," and also in line 23, after the word "investigate," insert the words "or have investigated."

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that my colleague, Mr. NORTON, who introduced this resolution, is absent from the House by leave. He is very much interested in this matter, and I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he could not consent to let this lie over without prejudice until after his return.

Mr. DOCKERY. I will state to my colleague that Mr. NORTON has conferred with the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and I am advised that the amendments are entirely satisfactory to him.

Mr. BINGHAM. This comes unanimously, I will state also, from the committee.

Mr. HATCH. I have no objections under the circumstances.

The amendments were considered, and agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

SOPHIA SCHIMMELFENNIG.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, before the motion of the gentleman from Michigan is put to the House I would like to call attention to the fact that there is a bill on the Speaker's table on which the previous question has been ordered. I refer to the bill (H. R. 5739) increasing the pension of Sophia Schimmelfennig.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. The Clerk will read the bill to which reference is made.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the pension of Sophia Schimmelfennig, widow of Alexander Schimmelfennig, deceased, late brigadier-general of the Army of the United States and major-general by brevet, be, and the same is hereby, increased to $50 a month.

Mr. KILGORE. Is that the bill which was reported from the Committee of the Whole House on Friday last?

The SPEAKER. This bill comes over from the session of Friday night last.

Mr. SPRINGER. Was there not an order that there should be debate for twenty minutes on either side?

The SPEAKER. Fifteen minutes on each side, if desired.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to have the report read, and I will take the floor merely for that purpose.

The report (by Mr. CRAIG) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5739) granting an increase of pension to Sophia Schimmelfennig, submit the following report:

General Alexander Schimmelfennig entered the service as colonel of the Seventy-fourth Pennsylvania Volunteers in 1861; took an active part in the battles of Bull Run, Chancellorsville, and Gettysburg. Was appointed brigadier-general in the summer of 1862; was sent to the harbor of Charleston in the fall of 1863 to assist General Foster and Admiral Dahlgren in their operations against the Confederates; while there distinguished himself as a brave and most excellent soldier and as an officer of integrity and intelligence; was the first general to enter Charleston with his troops after the evacuation. There are on file among the papers of this case several letters of a most highly complimentary character from Admiral Dahlgren and Maj. Gen. J. G. Foster, with thanks of both to General Schimmelfennig for most useful and valuable services.

He died brevet major-general on the 7th of September, 1865, a short time after his discharge, of disease contracted while in the service, for which his widow, Sophia Schimmelfennig, is now receiving a pension of $30 per month. She has been an invalid for a number of years, requiring throughout constant attendance, and has recently, through the most sad and accidental shooting of her only son, lost her chief support. She is now at the advanced age of sixty-two years, is infirm and poor, without means of support, save that furnished by the pension she is now receiving from the Government.

Your committee believe that this is a worthy case, and recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to ask the amount of the bill?

Mr. MORROW. Fifty dollars.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORROW moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The rule of the House provides that on Friday of each week, after the unfinished business has been disposed of, it shall then be in order to move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar; and if that motion fails then public business shall be in order, as on other days.

Now, I make the motion that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that clause 9 of Rule XVI is also in force, and therefore the motion of the gentleman from Michigan takes precedence, being first in order.

Mr. ENLOE. Then, Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of consideration upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If that motion of the gentleman from Michigan, chairman of the Committee of Military Affairs, shall be voted down the question will recur on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. If that motion shall be voted down it will be perfectly simple. The House has the matter under full control. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan to go into the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The question was put; and the Speaker announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 96, noes 77.

Mr. ENLOE, Mr. RICHARDSON, and others. Yeas and nays.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Oh, no; do not let us waste the time. Let us pass the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 104, nays 128, not voting 97; as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire simply to give notice that I shall renew this motion to-morrow morning.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCook, its Secretary, requested the return of the bill (S. 1332) entitled "An act granting to the city of Colorado Springs, in the State of Colorado, certain lands therein described for water reservoirs."

WATER RESERVOIRS FOR COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will lay before the House the message from the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, March 28, 1900.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to return to the Senate bill S. 1332, entitled "An act granting to the city of Colorado Springs, in the State of Colorado, certain lands therein described for water reservoirs."

The resolution was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering business on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar. When the committee last rose it had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3913) granting jurisdiction to the Court of Claims, notwithstanding any statutory bar, to the claims of J. F. Bailey & Co. and others. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] had offered an amendment and had the floor.

Mr. ENLOE. I desire to make a motion that the committee proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7616) for the allowing of certain claims for stores and supplies taken and used by the United States Army as reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion would not be in order now, as the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] has the floor. The gentleman had the floor when the committee last rose.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, on the 14th day of March, the bill—

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the question before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill pending before the committee is the bill which the Clerk has reported, and it was being considered when the committee was last in session.

Mr. ROGERS. I did not hear the Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3913) granting jurisdiction to the Court of Claims, notwithstanding any statutory bar, of the claims of J. F. Bailey & Co. and others.

Mr. CULBERTSON, of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to inquire whether the bill is now being debated under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. There is only one section in the bill.

Mr. CULBERTSON, of Texas. Then I understand that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] has an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] has offered an amendment, which is now pending.

Mr. CULBERTSON, of Texas. Do I understand that he has an hour?

The CHAIRMAN. There has been no limitation of the debate.

Mr. CULBERTSON, of Texas. I would like to have a little time.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of New Jersey, addressed the Chair.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAIDLAW]—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] has the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand that, and I desire to ask whether the gentleman from New Jersey is not willing that the bill shall be laid aside to-day, to be taken up at some future time.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of New Jersey. I am not.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand that the chairman of the Committee on Claims [Mr. LAIDLAW] desires that this bill shall be laid aside for the present.

Mr. LAIDLAW. I would be glad to have it postponed for a while until we can get some additional facts in reference to it.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] has the floor and unless he will yield for that purpose it can not be done; but if he is willing to yield, holding the floor, I hope he will do so now, and allow the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAIDLAW], who reported this bill, to have it laid aside for the present, because, as he states, he desires to submit some additional facts received from the Department.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of New Jersey. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], who, I think, either introduced this bill or takes some interest in it, also desires this arrangement to be made, and I am perfectly willing that the arrangement shall be made, retaining the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] moves that this bill be laid aside informally, without losing its place on the Calendar.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas, and Mr. KILGORE. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAIDLAW] having charge of the bill has stated that he desires to submit some additional facts at the next meeting of the committee or at some future time, and that he desires this bill to be laid aside until he can procure those facts.

Mr. KILGORE. Let the consideration of the bill go on and let the facts be submitted in the discussion.

Mr. SPRINGER. I supposed it would be better to have the facts before we passed the bill. Mr. Chairman, I move to proceed with the next bill on the Calendar.

Mr. ENLOE. I move to lay this bill aside.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] yield the floor?

Mr. BUCHANAN, of New Jersey. I am perfectly willing to yield if any satisfactory arrangement can be made. I have no desire to press the consideration of the bill at this time if the gentleman who reported it or the gentleman from Pennsylvania who is interested in it desires to have it postponed.

Mr. LAIDLAW. I wish to have it postponed temporarily, because I want to get some additional information in regard to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the motion. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] object to laying aside this bill informally?

Mr. KILGORE. Yes, I object to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] moves that the committee proceed to consider the next bill upon the Calendar.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, I think the first motion in order is my motion to lay aside this bill, as objection has been made to laying it aside. I move that the bill be now laid aside.

The CHAIRMAN. If this motion of the gentleman from Illinois is carried that will lay aside this bill.

Mr. ENLOE. I want to make a motion to take up a different bill from the one which the gentleman from Illinois proposes.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee if he desires to move to take up a special bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I yielded only for the purpose of having a motion made and an arrangement arrived at.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] proposes to move to take up another bill.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Has the pending bill been laid aside by an order of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] moves to take up a certain other bill. If the committee agree to his motion that virtually lays this bill aside.

Mr. KILGORE. A demand for the regular order will compel the consideration of this bill, and I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

In Committees of the Whole House business on their calendars may be taken up in regular order, or in such order as the committee may determine, unless the bill to be considered was determined by the House at the time of going into committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] is in order.

Mr. KILGORE. I make the point of order that this bill was under consideration at the conclusion of last Friday's session on the Private Calendar, and was brought over as unfinished business, and that therefore it is not in order at this time to move to lay it aside and take up another bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The committee have control of their work.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now take up and proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7616) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies taken and used by the United States Army as reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer a substitute for that motion.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. If this motion and all other motions are voted down, we will then proceed with the regular order, I suppose?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; under the rule.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of New Jersey. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If this motion be adopted, will not the bill which is now pending be in order when the House again goes into Committee of the Whole upon the Private Calendar, and will not its status remain the same?

The CHAIRMAN. It will. The bill will come up as unfinished business. Under the rule of the House all work in Committee of the Whole is under the control of the committee unless otherwise ordered by the House.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of New Jersey. Another inquiry. Is not the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not. The Clerk will report the title of the bill which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] moves to take up.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7616) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies taken and used by the United States Army, as reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee by substituting a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. ENLOE. I make the point of order that the gentleman can not make that motion at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is not yet before the committee. When the bill is taken up by the committee, then the gentleman from Wisconsin can make his motion.

Mr. THOMAS. I rise to a parliamentary question. I would like to know whether that motion is debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] is not debatable.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to say that this bill contains two hundred and eighty-five claims, amounting to $545,000—

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order. For the information of the Committee of the Whole the Clerk will read Rule XXV.

The Clerk read as follows:

All questions relating to the priority of business shall be decided by a majority without debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. KILGORE. Has the bill which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] desires to bring up been read?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not.

Mr. KILGORE. I demand the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not demand that at the present time. If the House decides to consider the bill it will be read; otherwise not.

Mr. KILGORE. If the bill is not read how are we to determine whether we will take up that bill or proceed with the regular order?

The CHAIRMAN. That is a matter for the Committee of the Whole to decide for itself.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. ENLOE, there were—ayes 64, noes 61.

Mr. THOMAS. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ENLOE and Mr. THOMAS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 82, noes 77.

CLAIMS FOR STORES AND SUPPLIES.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole decides to consider the bill, which the Clerk will read.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall ask leave to offer a substitute.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill (H. R. 7616) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies taken and used by the United States Army, as reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. THOMAS] is recognized. The pending question is, Shall this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation? The gentleman from Wisconsin offers, by way of substitute, a resolution which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the bill be reported back to the House—

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. I make the point of order that this bill is not properly before the Committee of the Whole. I do not think any such bill has ever been referred to the Committee on Claims; and I make the point of order that that committee has no right to report to the House for consideration a bill involving matters that properly belong to another committee, unless the bill has been first referred by the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I suggest that this bill is not reported from the Committee on Claims at all, but from the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. Whatever committee may report the bill I make the same point; of course the same principle is involved.

Mr. GROSVENOR. In connection with this point of order and before any objection to this bill and its present consideration is waived, I demand a separate consideration and a separate vote upon each item of the bill, these items being separate and distinct matters of legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can reserve that right when the bill comes to be considered by paragraphs.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry or a remark in the nature of a parliamentary inquiry. I suggest that the verbal and other amendments which are to be submitted by the gentleman in charge of the bill should be offered now and be considered as pending.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MCCOMAS. It is in the interest of proper parliamentary procedure that the corrections of spelling and of figures should now be made and a couple of omitted names put in, so that this whole matter may come up together.

Mr. THOMAS. On the question of order I wish to say a word.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order raised by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR] must first be considered. The Chair will listen to argument on that question.

Mr. ENLOE. In reference to that point of order I wish to say it is not necessary that a separate bill should be introduced in this House and referred to the Committee on War Claims in order that the committee may get jurisdiction of this subject. The Bowman act requires that all findings of fact by the Court of Claims shall be reported to the House of Representatives, and as a matter of course they are referred—it has been the rule all the time to refer them—to the Committee on War Claims, and that committee has a perfect right to get the bill in such shape as it pleases and report it back to the House.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to say a word on the point of order. The fact is, as the bill itself will show, that this bill was never introduced in the House except by authority of the Committee on War Claims. Whether that committee had authority to do so or not is, I suppose, the question raised by the gentleman from Iowa. The Committee on War Claims, by a majority vote, authorized the gentleman from Tennessee to report on behalf of the committee this bill. Whether the rules permit the introduction of the bill in that way in this House I am not able to say, but such are the facts.

Mr. ADAMS. In answer to the remark of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] I want to insist that neither the Bowman act nor any other act can make rules for the government of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-first Congress; and if our rules provide that a committee can have jurisdiction only of a matter referred to it that committee has no right to report this bill until it has been introduced and referred to the committee.

Mr. ENLOE. Then I would like to know where the Committee on Appropriations get authority to report to the House the bills which they report. Where does that authority come from?

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. There is a special rule of the House authorizing them to do it.

Mr. FARQUHAR. The Committee on Appropriations gets its authority from Rule XI; and it is only from that rule that such authority can be acquired by any committee.

Mr. KILGORE. A single observation upon this point of order. As I understand, all these claims have by act of the House or the act of some committee of the House been referred to the Court of Claims under the Bowman act, and that court has passed on the two questions of fact which alone are submitted to the court: the question as to the amount involved and the question as to the loyalty of the claimant. The question as to the liability of the Government does not belong to that court. When the court has passed upon the two questions of fact I have stated, the report is made to this House; and it would properly be incorporated in some bill which must be referred to a committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter. Until that is done, until some bill has been reported covering the report of the Court of Claims, I submit this House has no jurisdiction of the question.

As I understand—I am not familiar with the facts in this case—the Court of Claims has reported on all these claims with reference to the two questions of fact as to which alone the court has jurisdiction; those reports by some means or other have gone into the hands of the Committee on War Claims, which committee has chosen to provide for the payment of all these claims, fixing the liability of the Government to all these claimants upon the report of the Court of Claims, although no bill covering these claims has been introduced into the House and referred to the committee.

Now, I understand that is the status of this case. And I assume no bill can be considered in this House until it has been first introduced and referred to the proper committee and reported back by that committee and called up in regular order, unless it be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, there is no question as to the right of the Committee on War Claims to report this bill to the House for its action. Under the Bowman act these claims were referred to the Court of Claims for the purpose of ascertaining and reporting the facts to this House. That Bowman act provided, expressly, these claims should be reported back to Congress after the action of the court had been had upon them. It was provided further that they should be continued from Congress to Congress until final disposition had been made of them.

In the Fiftieth Congress the point of order was made that these claims by right should go to the head of the Calendar; and three of these claims were passed to the head of the Calendar. The point of order was then made that they were not properly at the head of the Calendar, and it was decided by the Speaker of the House at that time that these claims, when reported to Congress, should be referred to the Committee on War Claims. They were referred to the Committee on War Claims, and a bill was prepared by that committee in the Fiftieth Congress and reported to the House covering these claims. Since then these claims have been passed in such bills by the House; that is, these claims, after action of the Court of Claims has been had upon them, when they come to Congress from that court, have been referred by the Speaker of the House to the Committee on War Claims. If you do not continue the same course of action in reference to them, then what are you going to do with them? If they are referred to that committee by the Speaker of the House, and the committee can not bring them back, the action of the committee is estopped, and the action of Congress is estopped in reference to their disposition.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. With pleasure.

Mr. BURROWS. Where does the committee get the right, assuming these claims were properly referred to the committee or to the Court of Claims, where do they get the right to bunch all these claims and report them in a separate bill? Why can not you as well bunch all the claims before that committee and report them in a single bill?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I am willing to report every claim reported to be correct by that committee in one bill and let it be acted upon by the House.

Mr. BURROWS. But where do you get the rule which allows it to be done?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. There is no rule prohibiting it. It is in the power of the committee to report them in one bill if the committee shall choose to do so.

Mr. BURROWS. I submit, Mr. Chairman, the committee has no power to bunch all these claims in one bill and report it to the House.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. The committee have undertaken only to take all the bills of one class—that is, claims for stores and supplies—and to include them in one bill, and report it to the House.

Mr. BURROWS. I submit the committee has no such authority.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. We follow just exactly the practice which has been adopted in reference to what is known as the 4th of July cases, reported by the Quartermaster-General's Office as correct, including such claims as were reported upon favorably in one bill and reporting it to the House. Such bills have been reported back to this House in such cases ever since July, 1864, and Congress has passed them every time without question.

Mr. KILGORE. In what respect are these cases similar?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. The 4th of July cases are referred to the Quartermaster-General's Office to investigate and report upon the facts in each case. These claims are referred to the Court of Claims under the Bowman act to report to Congress the facts which may be found to be correct. In the 4th of July cases, when reported to Congress by the Quartermaster-General's Office, they have been included in the same bill by the committee and reported to the House for action. That has been considered as a precedent by this committee as to the course to be taken in reference to these claims sent to the Court of Claims, and they have been included in one bill, as in this case, and reported to the House.

The two points of order are these. The first is, the committee had no right to report these claims, because no bill has been introduced. These claims were referred to the committee under the rules of the House by the Speaker of the House. If the committee can not report them back, then the House is estopped and the Court of Claims and Congress are estopped.

The next point is that we can not bring these claims in a bunch in one bill. We have only followed the precedent adopted in reference to the claims reported from the Quartermaster-General's Office, and which claims, as I have said already, when reported have, since 1864, been provided for in bills of this character. That precedent has been established, and we have only followed it in this case.

Mr. PERKINS. Were these claims referred to the Committee on War Claims by the present House of Representatives?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. They were referred to this committee by the present House.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in asking the attention of the Chair is because it seems to me the whole question of order is in a nutshell. These cases rested originally on individual bills, all of which were referred to the Committee on War Claims in the last Congress. In obedience to the Bowman act, by explicit legislation of Congress each of these cases with a bill was referred to the Court of Claims for the purpose of ascertaining the loyalty of the claimant and the facts of the claim. The Court of Claims proceeded in each separate case to make its findings as to the facts. It reported its findings in each case to the House. When its findings came to the House, under the law they were referred, by the direction of the Speaker, to the Committee on War Claims, for the purpose of carrying out the intention of the Bowman act, to report them back either favorably or adversely to the House, that we may have the action of the House upon them.

Does it take, Mr. Chairman, a separate bill in each case when the finding of the court has been referred by the House to the committee? Must the committee wait until somebody introduces another bill, and a second, and a third, or a fourth bill, or until all of such cases have been covered by a bill of some shape? Why, it seems to me to be perfectly absurd. If the reference by the House to the committee is not for the purpose of committing the subject-matter to the committee, so that the committee shall determine what disposition it will make of the findings of the court, and the committee can report favorably or unfavorably on such finding—if it is not for the purpose of permitting the committee to do this, what is the purpose? In this case, having elected to report favorably, I think it absolutely absurd to raise the question of order here that the bill is not properly before the House.

It is purely a matter of legislative discretion. The reference of the findings of the Court of Claims to the committee gave it jurisdiction. Having thus acquired jurisdiction, the committee could exercise its own discretion, its own will, in reporting back to the House. It had the undoubted right to report back one bill or any other number of bills which in its judgment were necessary to bring the subject-matter before the House for action. I therefore insist that the question of order is not well founded.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I know of no greater injury that could be done to the course of orderly legislation in this country, upon matters of claims against the Government, than the establishment of a rule of the House, a statute of the country, or a decision of the Chair that would for a moment make possible such legislation as that involved in the pending bill. I know of no greater promise of wrongdoing than would be involved in a bill grouping, as this does, a large number of private individual claims, no one of which depends in any sort of degree upon the good faith or character of the others; all dependent for their validity upon a widely different state of facts, but all, as in this case, to be grouped together, the one to make weight for the other and aid its passage or else to break down and defeat the passage of the others.

So, Mr. Chairman, I want to examine the legal question involved, irrespective of my judgment as to the character of the pending bill, simply premising that the proposition insisted upon by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOCK] is a proposition fraught with the most dangerous elements to honest legislation.

If there ever was a measure that might with perfect propriety and without the possible censure of anybody be denominated a "log-rolling" measure, the bill now before the House certainly can with perfect propriety lay claim to that title.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him a moment? I wish to ask the gentleman if it has not been the unbroken custom of the House to pass the claims known as the 4th of July claims in a similar manner.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Let me complete the question. And, further, if it has not been the unbroken custom of the House also in every appropriation bill at every session of Congress to embrace in one bill the findings of the Court of Claims in such cases and pass them in that way.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman from Tennessee will not break into the ill-prepared argument that I have, I will come to the last question in its proper order, and I will show the gentleman from Tennessee, I think, and the chairman of the committee also, that there is a marked difference in the distinction he seeks to draw.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But the 4th of July claims have already been passed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I answer the gentleman in regard to the 4th of July claims that it may be he is right; his experience is longer than mine; but we have broken more than one "unbroken current" of authority in this House, and it is time that we should break several more. If, therefore, the bill now before the House is in the unbroken line of legislative precedents and authority, I am trying to show that that unbroken line is utterly pernicious in its character and opposed to good legislation.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But you have not broken the line of precedents in regard to the 4th of July claims, for in this session they were passed in the same way.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will come to the 4th of July claims in the proper time; but I think the gentleman will find, if he will be patient for a little while, that the argument he seeks to make will be turned against him and destroy the very position that he wishes to assume.

Mr. KILGORE. Will the gentleman let me—

Mr. THOMAS. Let me answer the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee, with the consent of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. The 4th of July claims were embodied in the bill introduced in the House and referred to the committee. This is a bill introduced by the committee, and never had been referred to them.

Mr. GROSVENOR. So the gentlemen will see that they stand here upon a widely different footing; but I would not have cared if the 4th of July bill came from the same committee. They stand upon a different footing, any way.

Mr. KILGORE. The question I wish to ask the gentleman is, whether or not the point of order ever has been made on what are known as the 4th of July claims.

Mr. GROSVENOR. So far as I know it never has been. But the gentleman knows that it is not uncommon for us to go along here and waive points of order that would be fatal to measures of this character.

Now, I desire to proceed with my argument. Each item of this bill is a separate and an independent measure. Originally it was in the form of a bill introduced in the House of Representatives, which became a separate invocation of legislation, if you please. It was surrounded by its own characteristics and dependent upon no other measure for its standing in the House, and the Bowman act provides exactly what shall be done with that character of claims. All the jurisdiction which this House obtains to-day upon the subject-matter of the pending bill it gets through the Bowman act. I assume that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOCK] will admit that, inasmuch as he has planted himself already upon the Bowman act.

Now, what is the Bowman act on this question of the separate character of these claims, and, as I shall term it for the purpose of this argument, the separate history of each one of these measures?

Whenever a claim is pending before any committee, either of the Senate or House of Representatives—

Now, that is the starting point; not when they are in a bundle of claims; not when there are several hundred claims. Nobody would pretend that a reference of ten claims or twenty claims or one hundred claims in a bundle could be made under the Bowman act. You start out with a claim—a single claim—and it is put under a certain jurisdiction which never leaves it, which clothes it with its character at every step. Now, what is to be done with a claim, not an omnibus bill, but a single claim? It is to be sent as a claim to the Court of Claims—the committee or the House may cause the same—

That is the single claim—

with the vouchers, papers, proof, and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the Court of Claims, and the same there shall be proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt.

Then it provides that the Court of Claims shall make report to the House of Representatives upon that claim. Would anybody undertake to say that the Court of Claims could lodge subsequent ultimate jurisdiction in the House by a report that would say, "The Court of Claims, having had under consideration 250 claims, as follows, they report that the claimants were loyal, and the following sums are to be allowed," and dump the whole grist into the House and ask it to take that as a compliance with the Bowman act? By no means. Mr. Chairman, it was intended by this legislation that each one of these claims shall constitute a separate and independent bill, standing upon its own merits, as I have said.

Now this report is made. Now comes the other question which the gentleman from Tennessee has spoken about. What is the jurisdiction now of the several committees of this House in the matter of originating legislation—because it is originating legislation to introduce a bill into the House of Representatives? If I introduce a bill to pay a claim, it is an origination of legislation upon that subject; and if I introduce a bill to tax a certain kind of importations into this country, it is an origination of legislation upon that subject. So I find, Mr. Chairman, by examination of the rules of the House, that the various committees of this House have various powers, all differing, or mostly differing, from the other. There is a class of committees that are authorized to introduce bills into the House, and I want to call your attention to the fact that the expression which confers power upon one or more of the committees, but not upon all, to do a certain thing, excludes the other committees from doing similar acts or acts of a similar quality.

I think that no gentleman will deny the soundness of that proposition, and the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE], therefore, that the Committee on War Claims is not forbidden to do an act, falls to the ground, because certain other committees of the House are authorized and empowered to do acts of a similar quality, and the Committee on War Claims is not one of those committees. Therefore, the expression of the power in one committee is an exclusion of the power from the other committee. This principle of law, I think, will not be denied.

Mr. FARQUHAR. For instance, the power of the Committee on Appropriations to originate appropriation bills, and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to originate the bill for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am coming to that directly, but the gentleman is right. The rules of the House must be considered to have had in their construction or origination a purpose that was a wise purpose. What was it? Why, in the very nature of things, the Appropriation Committee should not be bound by the mere introduction of bills into the House. Their duty is to provide appropriations of money for the various purposes of the Government.

Mr. ADAMS. At the instance of the Government.

Mr. GROSVENOR. At the instance of the Government. They are to answer the Departments of the Government, and there is a prescribed form in which the Department shall call upon that committee or those committees.

Mr. HOUK. And it is at the instance of the Government, through the Court of Claims, to allow the payment of these claims.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I know, but my friend has omitted to state that the Bowman act prescribed how these claims are to be adjudicated and allowed.

Mr. HOUK. I did not grasp all of the gentleman's argument, I suppose.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have no doubt about that. [Laughter.] And for once in his life my friend from Tennessee has made an "honest confession," and that is "good for his soul."

Mr. HOUK. I will do it every time. I suppose that I was incapable of gathering up his loose argument.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Your power of gathering up is not to affect at all the character of my argument.

Mr. PETERS. If the gentleman from Ohio will allow me, in regard to appropriations, I desire to state that even appropriation bills are prepared and introduced to the House and then referred to the committee.

Mr. GROSVENOR. So I understand; and I am strengthened in my position by the suggestion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] that even appropriation bills—and I have had some connection with one appropriation bill and I agree with him—are always introduced to the House and recommitted before the House can get jurisdiction to pass that bill.

But let me go on. The fifty-first subdivision—

Mr. McRAE. If it does not interrupt the gentleman from Ohio, I would like him to look at section 1 of the Bowman act and section 7, so that he may consider that in the point he is now attempting to make. If you will permit me I will read—

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have the act all before me. If you will permit me to conclude my point as to committees, then I will hear you.

Mr. McRAE. I wanted to call your attention to the first section.

Mr. GROSVENOR. This is not the proper place for me to be interrupted. Just let me go on to say what I am saying about the power and jurisdiction of these committees.

Mr. McRAE. That is the point. It is the question of the jurisdiction of the committees I desire to call your attention to.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me have my way about presenting this matter of the committees, and then you can explain your views afterwards.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to go forward. I am coming now to the committees of the House that are authorized by the rules of the House to report legislation to the House; that is, to originate legislation in the House. In the ninth page of the pamphlet copy of the rules of the House, in the fifty-first subdivision of Rule XI, I find the following provision:

The following-named committees shall have leave to report at any time on the matters herein stated, viz: The Committee on Rules, on rules, joint rules, and order of business; the Committee on Elections, on the right of a member to his seat; the Committee on Ways and Means, on bills raising revenue; the committees having jurisdiction of appropriations, the general appropriation bills; the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors; the Committee on the Public Lands, bills for the forfeiture of land grants to railroad and other corporations, bills preventing speculation in the public lands, and bills for the reservation of the public lands for the benefit of actual and bona fide settlers; the Committee on Territories, bills for the admission of new States; the Committee on Enrolled Bills, enrolled bills;—

They can not wait for a bill to be introduced, because there has been a bill introduced, passed, and handed over to them, and prepared for the signature of the Speaker, and hence this provision as to that committee—the Committee on Invalid Pensions, general pension bills; the Committee on Printing, on all matters referred to them of printing for the use of the House or two Houses; and the Committee on Accounts, all matters of expenditure of the contingent fund of the House.

Now, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] refers to the seventh section of the Bowman act, which provides:

That reports of the Court of Claims under this act, if not finally acted upon at the session to which they are reported, shall be continued from session to session and from Congress to Congress until the same shall be acted upon.

I can not see any pertinence whatever in that suggestion. If a claim is in the form of a bill, the bill goes over. We had a contest in the last Congress, as members of the Fiftieth Congress will remember, upon the question whether those bills were here or had to be reintroduced. That contest sprang up and occupied most of a day. I do not remember exactly what the decision was, but my best recollection is that the Chair decided that the bills were here and need not be reintroduced.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman permit a question? Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; if it is in the line of the particular argument I am making at this time.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. If I did not misunderstand the gentleman, he was quoting from Rule XI.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes, Rule XI, paragraph 51.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. The gentleman said that the committees he named were to have charge of certain bills and certain matters.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I read the rule exactly as it stands, and I am now making my argument upon it. It is Rule XI, subdivision or paragraph 51. It was held, as I recollect, in the Fiftieth Congress, by Mr. Speaker CARLISLE—and if I am wrong about that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] will correct me—that these bills, under the seventh section of the Bowman act, did not have to be reintroduced in that Congress.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. The Speaker said that the law made it proper for the Clerk to place them on the Calendar. That is just what he said.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; but he by no means undertook to say that they lost their character of bills and became an omnibus matter of claims that might go to a committee having no authority to report bills, and might come back here in the form of a single bill reported from that committee. That is the question that we are arguing about now.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understand that the gentleman from Ohio claims that this point of order is well taken because there was not a bill introduced in each particular case and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is one of my points.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, I ask the gentleman if there is no other way by which the committee can get jurisdiction of these matters. And further, if, when a finding of the Court of Claims is submitted to the House, as the Bowman act requires such findings to be submitted by the Speaker, and is referred by the Speaker to the Committee on War Claims, that does not give the committee full jurisdiction of the claim. And, if so, where is there any rule which prevents or prohibits that committee from putting two or more of these claims together in one bill? Also, upon this point, I will ask the gentleman how it is that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors get control of bills for improving the rivers and harbors of the country except by the reference to them of the reports of the Secretary of War or the engineers' reports? There is no separate bill introduced in each case of that kind.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman does not make that argument seriously, I think.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want the gentleman to point out the difference.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will make the difference very plain.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, I want the gentleman to tell us what the distinction is.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The distinction is as wide as a distinction can possibly be. In the first place, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors is one of the committees authorized to report bills. That is the first point.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Does the gentleman say that the Committee on War Claims can not report a bill?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I say they can not report an omnibus bill in which they have merged one hundred and fifty bills or claims. That is what I am arguing now. I am sticking to the case at bar, and not wandering off into a philosophical speculation as to what might be in some other case.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Does the gentleman say that the Committee on War Claims can not originate a bill with one hundred claims in it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am sticking to the question that is involved here, and I am saying that that committee can not take a set of bills which the law has clothed with an independent character and merge them together—

Mr. RICHARDSON. But they are not separate bills.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I say they are.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Why, the gentleman is complaining because they are not separate bills.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is exactly what I am doing.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But the matter itself was referred to the committee.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It was referred to them in the form of separate bills, each one of which stood upon its own merits, with a separate report from the Court of Claims, each bill called in the law "a case," each bill having its own characteristics. Now, I deny the power of the Committee on War Claims to do this, and I deny the propriety of the legislative practice which permits or would permit the grouping together of all those bills, the destruction of their individual character, and the massing of them together into one general lump.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is not a question of propriety that we are discussing here, but a question of order. The question of the propriety of such a method of legislation does not arise.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It does arise.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, will the gentleman come back to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and show me the difference between that case and this. And I want to ask him one further question. Does he take the position that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds can not put two or more public buildings together in a bill?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I deny that they can do anything of the kind. Now, I decline to be interrupted further until I complete my argument. But, by way of illustration of my point, I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] whether he is willing to stand up here and say that the Committee on Invalid Pensions can take one hundred private pension bills and put them into one bill and report them to this House.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON and Mr. KILGORE rose.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will take you one at a time and answer the whole of you. [Laughter.]

Mr. KILGORE. The gentleman from Ohio as I apprehend does not seem to have the exact facts in this case [laughter], but I am with him in his proposition. The truth of the business is that bills have never been introduced in relation to these matters at all.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand that.

Mr. KILGORE. Bills have been introduced in some cases, but in a great many other cases no bills have been introduced.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Texas, because, if that is so, then all the arguments which have been made on the other side fall to the ground, and there is no question about the illegal character of this bill.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. That is just the point I made.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And I beg the pardon of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR] for not allowing that statement to come in. The facts as they now appear settle beyond all peradventure the argument in favor of the position we have occupied. What, then, has been done in this case? Suppose, by way of illustration, that a committee should take, say, one hundred private bills, one hundred pension bills, group them into one bill, and add fifty more private pension claims that the committee saw fit to report upon.

Mr. FARQUHAR. And which never were referred to them.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Never referred to them—claims which never had the character of separate bills.

Now let me finish my argument in answer to the gentleman from Tennessee in regard to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. That committee receives from the Secretary of War a report as to the propriety and the value of a certain river improvement; it gets reports as to another and another and another such improvement; and under the authority given by the rule I have quoted, the committee introduces in the House one bill making an appropriation of money, not declaring or establishing the propriety of any particular work, but making an appropriation. That bill is referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and reported back, the original jurisdiction having been conferred on the committee by the action of the House in referring the bill to it. That question does not stand upon all fours with this. In this case bills have never been referred to the War Claims Committee.

The river and harbor bill is first introduced by an individual member of the House, usually a member of the committee, usually the chairman of the committee. He introduces the bill; it is his bill. It goes to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and is reported back by that committee, and placed on the Calendar. The House has referred the subject-matter to the committee; it is within their jurisdiction; and the House gets jurisdiction in that way; and not only in that way, but by virtue of the law of Congress which devolves upon the Secretary of War the duty of informing Congress with reference to the meritorious public works of the country. That is a public appropriation, an appropriation for a public purpose. Here is an appropriation to pay a mass of private individuals their private claims. I want the gentlemen who are to reply to tell me the difference between the attitude they occupy in this case and the attitude they would occupy if there were fifty private pension bills and ten claims for pensions, that never were introduced in the House and never referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, all grouped in one measure and brought in here for action.

Mr. WHEELER, of Alabama. We report in one measure the appropriation of about $90,000,000 that we make every year for the payment of pensions, such pension claims as the Pension Office may declare to be valid. The Court of Claims has declared these to be valid claims. We specify these claims separately in the bill, but in the case of the pension bill we appropriate for all in a lump.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am not talking about the appropriation, my friend. I am asking your views in regard to the case I have stated, and I think you will not differ with me. Suppose there are fifty men asking to be put on the pension-roll by special acts of Congress, and the Committee on Invalid Pensions takes those fifty bills, puts them all into one bill in fifty paragraphs, then takes the names of ten more persons whose applications were never put in any bill, and never referred to the committee, puts ten paragraphs in the bill providing for these ten persons, making sixty private bills all incorporated in one bill, and the committee asks the House to take jurisdiction of that bill—

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. When not a single bill was before them?

Mr. GROSVENOR. When not one bill was before them. Let me tell the gentleman, further, that the Bowman act contemplates the original character of the claim (that is the bill) pending in Congress. There can not be a claim pending in Congress except by virtue of a bill. I may stand here having in my pocket a claim against the Government; but if I do not introduce a bill covering the claim it does not come under the Bowman act. The very moment it is introduced, it becomes a separate and independent cause of action, if you please. It goes to the Court of Claims. After that court has made its report we have a right to examine the basis upon which the report is made; we have something more to do than merely to make an appropriation. We must pass upon the question of fact. We are to legislate upon the question whether we will pass this bill or not.

Now, does the gentleman say that we are called upon to legislate in one bill upon the questions of fact found in two hundred and fifty claims, one hundred of those claims never having been introduced into Congress at all, never having been claims pending within the scope and meaning of the Bowman act?

Mr. WHEELER, of Alabama. The gentleman from Ohio says we do not differ; I want to show that we did not differ a year ago when, as he will recollect, a bill precisely similar to this was before the House. I read the title of the bill, and it is one upon which the gentleman spoke at that time:

A bill for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies taken and used by the United States Army as reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act.

The gentleman who now has the floor [Mr. GROSVENOR], in a speech which will be found on page 1679 of the RECORD of the last Congress, advocated that bill. I admit that we are not talking now on the merits of this question, but in the case of the bill to which I refer, and which the gentleman advocated, no point of order was made.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Was not that the bill which we designate as the "4th of July claims bill?"

Mr. WHEELER, of Alabama. It was a bill to pay claims under the Bowman act. You will find the title on page 1670 of the RECORD.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Was a point of order made in that case?

Mr. WHEELER, of Alabama. No, sir; but it was a bill similar to this; and the only object in making a point of order now on your part is to oppose this bill. On that bill you said—

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. No doubt some of these claims are valid; I suppose they are.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let the gentleman from Alabama complete his statement; and then I will answer him.

Mr. WHEELER, of Alabama. The gentleman advocated the bill to which I have referred, embracing, as this bill does, a number of claims all lumped together. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LEE] proposed an amendment at that time to which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] objected, because it tended, as he said, to jeopardize a very meritorious bill. The gentleman from Ohio at that time used this language:

Now, can we not meet this question upon its own merits? Is it necessary that this bill, covering as it does a line of claims about which there seems to be no contention, should be loaded down with a proposition so fraught with ultimate consequences as this question? It seems to me that if this bill stood here upon its own merits it would not last five minutes; and it seems further that it is a strong suggestion against the justice of the bill that it is sought to be put on here as an amendment upon a bill that everybody seems in favor of the immediate passage of, that it should so hamper and delay it.

It will thus be seen that there was no contention last year by the gentleman in regard to claims of this character.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does the gentleman say these claims are the same quality of claims those were?

Mr. WHEELER, of Alabama. The same quality; exactly the same quality.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Name one of those claims, and tell me how it compares with these.

Mr. WHEELER, of Alabama. Every one of these claims is the same as those.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Are you quite sure?

Mr. WHEELER, of Alabama. Quite sure.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am very sure you are mistaken.

Mr. WHEELER, of Alabama. I recollect the claim of Coles.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I wish to say to the gentleman from Alabama just this: I have no doubt I supported the bill to which he has referred. I was not opposed to any particular portion or paragraph of it. If the RECORD shows it, then I made that speech. Now, because I was in favor of a bill composed of numerous items against which no objections were made and against which no point of order was raised, the argument of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] is, I must never oppose a bill on account of misjoinder of items, because on one occasion I waived the point of order. Is not that an argument which will be considered weighty?

Mr. WHEELER, of Alabama. Everybody favored that bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Everybody favored it.

Mr. WHEELER, of Alabama. Everybody on that side favored it.
Mr. GROSVENOR. Everybody does not favor this by a long way, let me tell the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. PETERS. I injected a statement into the gentleman's speech that appropriation bills were introduced and referred to the committee. I find since that was done only for the purpose of having the bills printed, and also that it is not necessary to have those appropriation bills introduced for reference to the committee.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The ground I stand upon is that the rules of the House give the Committee on Appropriations that power. I am willing to examine each one of these claims. I am willing to take each one of these claims and have it carefully examined. But I say here I will not be bound in my judgment by the action of the Court of Claims during the last four years, as I will show when the proper occasion arrives—not that the court was defective in its patriotism, not that the court was unwilling to arrive at just conclusions, but that the judgment of the Court of Claims in many cases was a default judgment, and many of them are worse than that; they are judgments practically by confession, confession of officers who ought to have been there to defend the position of the Government.

Mr. ENLOE. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ENLOE. If that point is to be gone into we wish to be heard upon it. But I make the point of order that it has nothing to do with the question under discussion.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I wish to say in support of the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that we have the right to examine the action and judgment of the Court of Claims on each one of these items.

Mr. ENLOE. But the gentleman was proceeding to make statements in reference to the method of procedure in the Court of Claims, which is not pertinent at this time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will state it when the proper time comes.

Mr. ENLOE. Yes, when the proper time comes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. My point is this: This bill is made up of a large number of claims which find their way here under the Bowman act, and the individual autonomy of each one of those claims is to be maintained until final action is taken on them by Congress. This bill contains matters which properly go to the War Claims Committee, but they are commingled with matters which ought not to go to that committee under any authority which had jurisdiction to refer to the War Claims Committee. I claim by parliamentary law, therefore, this bill is not properly on the Calendar, and that the point of order ought to be sustained.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio have taken such a very wide range that it is very important that we should examine and see what is actually before this committee.

The point of order made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERE] is before the committee for consideration. It is "that the committee has no jurisdiction of these claims, for the reason that no bill for the payment of either of the claims has ever been referred to the Committee on War Claims." Now, sir, the gentleman from Tennessee, who has charge of this bill and on whose motion it was taken up for consideration to-day, is a member of the Committee on War Claims, and he says—and other members of the Committee on War Claims have made the same statement to me—that all the claims referred to in this bill were either before the Committee on War Claims because of bills referred by the Speaker of the House or because of petitions sent to the Committee on War Claims by the House.

I know that there are two claims embraced in the bill under consideration that I had the honor to embody in bills, for the relief of M. I. Durham, administrator, and for the relief of W. N. Potts; and these were referred by the Speaker of the House to the Committee on War Claims, and subsequently, under the provisions of the Bowman act, were referred by the Committee on War Claims to the Court of Claims. So that the first point of order made by the gentleman from Iowa falls to the ground, because he says that the Committee on War Claims has no jurisdiction of the claims embodied in the bill for the reason that their subject-matter, separately or collectively, had not been referred to the committee, and that no bill or substantial case covering these claims had been so referred.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman allow an interruption just at this point? Were the bills to which the gentleman from Kentucky now refers as having been introduced by himself presented during the present session of Congress?

Mr. McCREARY. They were; and they were presented also in the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses. I am informed by members of the Committee on War Claims that the bill now under consideration is made up of claims that were introduced in this or previous Congresses, either by bill or petition, and referred to that committee, either in this Congress or some previous Congress, and then transmitted under the Bowman act to the Court of Claims.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the question arises as to what is the Bowman act, exactly what was designed to be accomplished by Congress in the passage of that act. I will read its first section.

It may be said in this connection that the act was to provide for cases of just this character. It was an act providing for a fair and impartial adjudication by a competent court of just such claims as are embraced in the bill now under consideration, and it was enacted to afford relief and assistance to Congress in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government. The first section of this act provides—

That whenever a claim or matter is pending before any committee of the Senate or House of Representatives, or before either House of Congress, which involves the investigation and determination of facts, the committee or House may cause the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the Court of Claims of the United States, and the same shall there be proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt. When the facts shall have been found, the court shall not enter judgment thereon, but shall report the same to the committee or to the House by which the case was transmitted, for its consideration.

Now, I hold that the very action required by the Bowman act has been had in this case. The bills were originally introduced in the House of Representatives. They were referred to the War Claims Committee. That committee referred them to the Court of Claims, and the Court of Claims now under the first section of the Bowman act sends the report of the court back to the House and through the House to the committee, which embodies them in its report in the bill which is now before us for consideration, embracing the very matters on which the court has rendered a favorable report. It is admitted by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. THOMAS] that about two-thirds of the claims embraced in the bill were embodied in bills that were referred to the Committee on War Claims and then referred to the Court of Claims. This being so, the bill is not amenable to the objection urged by the gentlemen from Iowa [Mr. KERE]; and it may be stated also that under the Bowman act if the report of the Court of Claims to Congress is not acted on when first reported it shall be continued from Congress to Congress until finally acted on.

The further point is made by the gentleman from Iowa that, if either of these claims was properly before the committee, they have no jurisdiction and no right to report more than one of the claims in any bill; in other words, that they have no right to report a bill embracing a number of them.

For many years the Committee on War Claims has reported a bill similar to this at every session of Congress, and the precedent has been followed this session. But outside of that I call the attention of the committee to subsection 31 of Rule XI of the rules of the House of Representatives, which subsection declares, in directing how legislation shall be referred to the respective committees, that—Claims arising from any war in which the United States has been engaged shall be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

Now, in accordance with that rule, the claims embodied in this bill under consideration were referred to the Committee on War Claims, and properly referred. They were considered by that committee, referred to the Court of Claims, and have come back to the House, and are all here embodied in one bill. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors has been given similar powers by Rule XI, which declares that subjects relating to the improvement of rivers and harbors shall be referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and this committee reports a bill every session of Congress containing appropriations for different rivers and harbors, all in one bill. Then why should we not in this case group together all the claims that have been reported favorably by the Court of Claims and embody them in one bill? It has been so held or rather such has been the practice for years. It has been done, as I am informed, ever since Congress first commenced the consideration of claims under the Bowman act. I see no reason why it should not be done now. There is no rule prohibiting it; and as the bill will be read by paragraphs and each claim will be considered separately, I see no proper ground for objection, unless, indeed, there are members on this floor who are opposed to the fair and just consideration of war claims that have been favorably considered by the Committee on Claims. I believe, therefore, that the bill now under consideration is properly before the committee, and the committee has jurisdiction of the claims embraced in the bill, and the point of order made by the gentleman from Iowa should be overruled.

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. Chairman, the real trouble about this bill, against which is raised this question of order, is that the bill itself is only a partial compliance with the law; strictly, all of these bills ought to have their place, coming over from former Congresses, at the head of the Private Calendar in their order, not where they are now, but far ahead of where this bill places them.

I have been surprised at some of the gentlemen who have presented their views on this question finding a difference between the pending bill and other bills containing separate items. Sir, the 4th of July claims bill, which has passed this House twenty-three times annually since that statute was enacted, is a bill gathering all of the same sort of claims for quartermasters' and commissary stores and supplies, payable in different amounts and to different persons.

But the whole of these claims embodied here have been adjudicated by a court of high authority with a number of judges, on testimony sifted by the examination of lawyers, by cross-examination, rebuttal, and careful elimination in amount, the action being to reject in many of the cases and in others to scale them down; whereas in the 4th of July claims Congress has twenty-three times passed bills covering the whole of them simply upon ex parte statements, without trial by judges, without sifting by lawyers, without cross-examination by counsel for the Government; and upon that slight authority has done what it had a right to do for the same subject-matter, the same class and kind of claims: put them together in one bill and under one title; and the only fault about this bill as it is now is that it should have stated at the end the amount, namely, in all the sum of so many dollars.

It is one bill. The gentleman who last argued this matter has more than once aided here in the passage of the river and harbor bill, relating to various classes of legislation. It embraces at least five or six kinds, while this embraces but one. The river and harbor bill provides for canals, rivers, and harbors, preliminary surveys, locks, gates, and dams at different places—

Mr. WHEELER, of Alabama. And for the purchase of land.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Yes; for the purchase of land and real estate and many other things. This bill the gentleman calls a job, and yet he supports that sort of a bill every year. Here you have your sundry civil appropriation bill covering under one title everything on earth. By its very title it is a "sundry" civil appropriation bill—matters referred to the Committee on Appropriations merely by estimate, and all come in under one bill, amounting to about $25,000,000; different in classes, different in kind, different in subject-matter, different in everything, "sundry," "various," "varying," different in every degree. And then you have (for I know something of this matter from observation of five years on that committee) the general deficiency bill. In that you have classes of claims of different variety, for different purposes, for different people. During this Congress I voted for a bill of that kind, and I have no doubt that my friend who has just taken his seat also voted for it.

We actually voted to pay in one bill, which I hold in my hand, not only five thousand different persons in different amounts and for four different classes of subjects, but we really enabled the payment of claims upon the finding of one man, not a court—without cross-examination, without investigation, without rebutting or counter testimony, but upon the decision of one man and auditor. Not only that; we went further and provided that we would appropriate in a single bill, called the "urgent deficiency bill," in the second section, for these classes of claims, "for arrears of pay to volunteers." I voted for it. Gentlemen around me voted for it. For "bounty to volunteers"—

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. MCCOMAS. Not at this time. We provided for the payment of bounty under the act of July 28, 1864, and we provided for the commutation of rations to prisoners of war in rebel prisons, and we provided not only for the payment of these items, but also for horses and other property. Now, in this Court of Claims bill there is but one class, "for stores and supplies furnished quartermasters and commissaries," and which were "taken and used" by the Army of our Government; but here, in the urgency deficiency bill, every variety of claim under the sun is added and provided for by a clause here:

And for payment of such amounts additional thereto as may be certified to be due by said accounting officers on this account during the fiscal year 1890, so much therefor as may be necessary is hereby appropriated.

And we actually provided for the payment of claims not yet allowed and passed upon, that never will come to any committee, never will be sent before the Appropriation Committee, never will be referred to this House for its action; we passed them in a lump.

It is rather late now, after these things have been passed, for my friend to say that when you put together in one single bill claims for stores supplied by loyal, honest, true men to this country, which have been passed upon by an able court acting under law, it is a bunching of claims (and these have been due for a quarter of a century), when we have passed a bill that has bunched claims, as I have shown, in the provisions of the bill to which I have referred.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MCCOMAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Is there a single dollar appropriated in the urgency deficiency bill that is not in pursuance of previously existing law?

Mr. MCCOMAS. I am glad the gentleman has asked me that question. In that bill provision is made of $711,000 for claims in part not yet adjudicated and passed; and we only claim the right to take up these claims and pass them under existing law. They have been sent by special act to some place where somebody might and did pass upon them and report them back to Congress; they come back here because the law did not provide for their payment, and they may be provided for in one bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why did you not put these claims into the urgent deficiency bill and pass them in it?

Mr. MCCOMAS. Because there is no law authorizing their payment in that way; it did authorize their consideration in this way. It is a gratuitous assumption on the part of my friend to say that there is not a law for this. I will show you presently what has been the law on this very subject.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Does the gentleman from Maryland say that a single item of appropriation in the urgent deficiency bill is an appropriation that was not authorized by existing law?

Mr. MCCOMAS. I say that these unaudited claims were not authorized to be paid by any existing law. They have never been audited. But that bill gave them the power to have them paid. I voted for it myself.

Mr. BOUTELLE. What right had you to put it in the bill, then?

Mr. MCCOMAS. The right of this Congress to legislate.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But it is absolutely forbidden by the rules of the House, unless it has been authorized by existing law.

Mr. MCCOMAS. But Congress did not prohibit, but passed the bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Then if you did so it was because the point of order was not raised.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I am not going to meet things that do not happen to be up at the time. I am taking the things that did happen and the laws that have passed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MCCOMAS. I should like to know the principle—

Mr. BOUTELLE. I undertake to say that there has never been an urgent deficiency bill passed here containing appropriations that were not authorized by law.

Mr. MCCOMAS. The gentleman said he rose to ask me a question, and now he "undertakes to say;" but I am just now undertaking to say something myself, and therefore I decline to be interrupted. [Laughter.]

Mr. KILGORE. Is it not the fact that those appropriation bills simply made an appropriation of so much money, to be expended in payment of claims after they had been properly adjudicated?

Mr. MCCOMAS. I stated twice, and if the gentleman had listened to what I said he would have understood me, that it was actual legislation authorizing the payment of the money for these claims whenever they should hereafter be audited, which could not have been paid without this additional legislation; and I say that was right.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It may have been right, but it was out of order.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I am not accounting for things now.

Mr. BOUTELLE. This is a question of order.

Mr. MCCOMAS. It is not merely a question of order. This is a question of whether or not, under existing law, there is authority for this House to consider these claims under this bill, and I say the form of the existing law covers the framework of the bill.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. The question is whether the bill is properly here.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I am discussing that question, if the gentleman will allow me. Now, Mr. Chairman, take the title of this bill itself, "For the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies taken and used by the Union Army under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1863, known as the Bowman act." It purports in its title to be an appropriation of money under an act of Congress covering a certain class of cases coming before Congress. Now, what light have you—and I now speak of the jurisdiction—what light have you upon the framework of the title to that bill? Turn to the first section of the Bowman act and you will find its language is that when the facts shall have been found the court thereon shall report the same to the committee.

Under that power these claims have come back to Congress in the Forty-ninth, the Fiftieth, and the Fifty-first Congresses. That is the provision in the first section of the Bowman act, which you will find on page 300 of the Manual and Digest. Now turn to section 7. There you will find a section taken in part from the original act of Congress which laid the foundation for the Court of Claims as a separate court. That was copied into the Bowman act as the seventh section, and it provides—

That reports of the Court of Claims to Congress under this act, if not finally acted on during the session at which they are reported, shall be continued from session to session and from Congress to Congress until the same shall be finally acted upon.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if you turn to First Court of Claims Reports you will find, in the beginning of the book, the act of 1855 under which this court came into existence. Section 8 of that act is transported into the body of the Bowman act. It provides—

That said reports and the bills reported as aforesaid—

Because they had reports and bills there—and I am coming to the point of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] about reports and bills—

That said reports and bills reported as aforesaid shall, if not finally acted upon during the session to which said reports are made, be continued from session to session.

And so on, proceeding in the very language of the Bowman act from which I have just read, the seventh section of the Bowman act.

Now, what was the ruling of the Speaker in the last Congress, and what has been the practice of Congress upon this subject? The law that I have read particularly required a bill separate and a report separate, but the Bowman act makes a change in that respect; it omits "the bill and the report," and provides only that the reports of the Court of Claims, if not finally acted upon during the session to which they are made, shall be continued from session to session, etc., until disposed of. In the Thirty-seventh Congress, second session, page 42 of the House Journal, the Speaker announced that—would be again read the second time, and, together with the adverse reports of the said court which were left undisposed of, be committed to the Private Calendar.

In conformity with law and the usage of former Congresses such bills from the Court of Claims as were left undisposed of at the close of the last Congress

Again, when this question came up in the Fiftieth Congress, I had the honor to ask the Speaker a question, which will be found on page 110 of the RECORD of December 19, 1887, and I ask the attention of the House and of the Chair to the ruling which was made by the distinguished Speaker of the last Congress with respect to these very claims about which I am now talking, claims which come under the modification made of the act of 1855 by the Bowman act, which carefully omitted the requirement of separate reports and bills in Congress upon each separate claim, upon which requirement my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has based so much of his argument.

That law gave the jurisdiction to the Court of Claims; they were to pass upon the facts and to apply the law; they were to investigate the question of loyalty, and to determine what money was due, and to report the cases back. Then, under this act of Congress, which is something more than a rule of this House when it directs the procedure of the House, the reports of the court are to continue from session to session and from Congress to Congress until disposed of. I asked the eminent Speaker of that Congress [Mr. CARLISLE] a question, which I will read from page 110 of the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. McCOMAS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McCOMAS. The Bowman act, chapter 116, etc., volume 22 of the Statutes at Large, in section 7, provides—

"That reports of the Court of Claims to Congress under this act, if not finally acted upon during the session at which they are reported, shall be continued from session to session and from Congress to Congress until the same shall be finally acted upon."

Now, in order to give effect and force to that continuance from Congress to Congress, my question is: Will not claims thus reported back from the Court of Claims to the last Congress, and then reported by this committee to the Forty-ninth Congress with an accompanying bill—standing on the Calendars of the last Congress—will not those claims, under the terms of the section which I have read, be placed upon the Calendar and be the first claims in priority on the Calendar for consideration during the present Congress? I send to the Speaker's desk the act to which I have referred.

Now, here is the decision of the Speaker:

The Chair remembers the terms of the act. The practice of the House has been, when a report is received from the Court of Claims, it is referred to the committee which had originally jurisdiction of the matter—the Committee on War Claims or the Committee on Claims, as the case may be. If that committee during that Congress reports the claim back again to the House, the Chair thinks that the section of the act to which the gentleman from Maryland refers requires the report to be continued on the Calendar; and the Chair has so instructed the Clerk in the present session, to place on the Calendar in regular order all the reports made by committees on reports from the Court of Claims. That will be done.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa, and Mr. GROSVENOR rose

Mr. McCOMAS. Now, then—

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. I say, "Now, then"—[Laughter.]

Mr. McCOMAS. Let me make my own argument. My "now, then" is pertinent to my argument. I will hear the gentleman directly when his "now, then" is more appropriate.

Rule XI provides that—

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule.

What is "proposed legislation" under the Bowman act and what is the practice of the Speaker? These reports come from the Court of Claims, and the Speaker, as stated in the decision I have read, sends them to the Committee on War Claims by reason of the jurisdiction given by that act and the jurisdiction given by the rules of this House in all Congresses, including the present.

All proposed legislation.

That does not mean a report or a bill exclusively.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Do not the estimates for appropriations to pay the 4th of July claims come here in the same way?

Mr. McCOMAS. My friend from Georgia [Mr. CLEMENTS] is right; his suggestion is timely. Reports upon the 4th of July claims come here in the same way; "proposed legislation" in the President's message comes here in the same way, and is referred to the various committees as "proposed legislation." Under the act of Congress these claims come back here from the Court of Claims to be acted on and are continued from session to session and from Congress to Congress until action is finally taken. The rulings of the Speaker of the Thirty-seventh Congress and the Speaker of the Fiftieth Congress have shown what is the proceeding in these cases; and when these reports go to the committee it has full and complete jurisdiction. If that committee has not jurisdiction, where else is jurisdiction lodged? If that committee has not jurisdiction, then this law is a mockery and a fraud.

I put the question to the practical judgment of the Chair. Here are these claims; they come here under an act seven years old, providing for the payment of claims of loyal people for supplies taken by the armies of the Union—taken ordinarily from men who could least afford to bear the loss. The property of these men went to feed the Union armies, while from some of these farms the sons as "boys in blue" were fighting in the ranks.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. As the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS] has had considerable experience in this House and comes, as I do, from a section of country where a great many of these claims originate, I would like to ask him whether his experience since he has been a member has shown him any hope of relief for these loyal claimants except such as is offered by a bill of this kind.

Mr. McCOMAS. The suggestion of my friend is correct; there is no other hope on earth for any of these people. Unless Congress will honestly take up and consider in their order these separate claims as they may be put at the head of the Calendar (which has not been done), the only other possible hope for the payment of these just claims of loyal men is by a bill of this kind.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. One other question: whether any class of war claims has ever come before this House with higher authentication or upon so thorough investigation for the protection of the interests of the Government as these cases.

Mr. McCOMAS. If the gentleman had heard the first part of my remarks he would know that I had enlarged on that fact; that here is a bill embracing claims which have had more thorough sifting, more careful weighing, than has ever before been given to such cases.

Mr. KILGORE. The interrogatory propounded by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] relates to the merits of this case, and I would like to ask one question upon that subject myself, if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. McCOMAS. I hope the gentleman will be very brief, because I do not desire to occupy the time of the House.

Mr. KILGORE. Oh, we have plenty of time. [Laughter.] Is it not a fact that there has been a claims commission for the purpose of passing on these claims; that there has been a court established since the war for the purpose of passing on these Southern war claims? Have there not been two opportunities to have these matters adjudicated?

Mr. McCOMAS. Well, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. KILGORE. I want to ask the gentleman another question. What authority has a committee to act on any matter unless it be some matter which is before it by reason of a bill or resolution introduced in the House and referred to that committee?

Mr. McCOMAS. My friend will pardon me if I decline to consider questions which are irrelevant to this discussion. The facts in regard to the Southern Claims Commission and other commissions are irrelevant to this matter of quartermasters' supplies. There are thousands of facts which have no part in this discussion because they are irrelevant. My friend from Texas is quite a concrete fact; but he and his questions are irrelevant in this discussion. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will answer the last question of my friend, the only one which is relevant.

Rule XI, to which I referred awhile ago, provides for the reference, not only of bills, but of all "proposed legislation," which includes the reference of recommendations in the President's message, which includes the reference of reports from the Court of Claims under the Bowman act, which includes the reference to the Committee on Appropriations, of which I am a member, of the Book of Estimates, without any bill or report at all. The report upon the French spoliation claims came into this body and was referred by resolution to the Committee on Appropriations; and those claims, embracing a great number of amounts to be paid to hundreds and hundreds of persons, were included in one bill; and no question of order was made upon their consideration in that form.

In conclusion, let me submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that, if the ruling which you may make should be unfavorable to the consideration of these claims in this form, some method should be pointed out by which, under the statute, the just claims of loyal men, claims which have already been too long delayed, may be considered and paid. The Court of Claims has found the facts in these cases, as it did in the case of the French spoliation claims, under act of Congress. I notice that the minority of the committee, in speaking of these cases having been before the War Claims Committee, do not assail any of these findings; they talk generally; they are not specific. I am not concerned about generalities. When I am discussing a question of fact I like concrete instances. If these findings of the Court of Claims are bad, if these claimants were not loyal, if their claims are not just, if the amounts proposed to be allowed are excessive, the minority of the committee ought to have pointed out any such objections. After seven years of canvassing and sifting, not one of these claims, apparently, has been paid.

I myself now recall one of these claims which came from the Court of Claims. It has been passed by the House three times. It is in a separate bill now. It is a claim of a man, an old abolitionist, who, being opposed to slavery, manumitted his slaves long before the war and paid for their support because in Maryland they could not live as freemen. He sent them to Liberia and there supported them. The Army of the Union took his property, and the items are, with others, here bunched together for supplies and stores for A, B, and C, as you have seen, all under one title providing for the payment of the same class of claims. It is the proper form under the law, under the reference of the claim by the Speaker under the rule, under the terms of our present rules, as well as the last rules of this House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I wish to say to the gentleman from Maryland that the gross sum put into the urgent deficiency bill was to pay salaries, monthly pay, and allowances to soldiers and officers of the Union Army who have not yet been paid according to existing statutes of the country, and other claims for payment, for which there exists in the statutes of the country legislation entitling them to their pay. I heard the discussion, and talked with the Second Auditor to-day on the subject.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Not yet audited?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand they were not then. That is, A. B. was paid as a sergeant when he ought to have been paid as a lieutenant. The law fixed his pay at so much, but he got a less sum. It was objected to, that this sum of money should not be included to pay these claims when audited, the law standing there in the statutes authorizing their payment.

I make this statement to relieve the question of the insidious, dangerous, and fallacious argument of the gentleman from Maryland; that is all.

Mr. RICHARDSON rose.

Mr. SPINOLA. Who is entitled to the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask attention to the point I desire to make. It seems to me the point of order the gentleman makes goes to this extent: That the Committee of the Whole House can not consider this bill.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that question ought to have been addressed to the House, and not to the Committee of the Whole House. On the 28th of February the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] reported this bill to the House of Representatives, and the House reported it to the Committee of the Whole—that is, to this committee—and in fact ordered the committee to consider this bill.

There was no point made against its consideration at that time. There was no point of order reserved against the bill or its consideration, and it is now too late for the Committee of the Whole, a creature of the House of Representatives, to say it is not in order to consider a bill which the House has ordered it to consider.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GROSVENOR. How could I know? By the rules of the House I did not know and could not know until the bill was reported, and how could I waive a point of order which I could not make?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not undertake to say the rule is right; but the bill was ordered to be reported to the committee and they were ordered to consider it, and the committee can not raise the point of order that it can not consider the bill which on the 28th of February was referred to it for consideration.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But we have excepted and insisted upon the point of order at the very first moment that it could be done.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. And, moreover, the points of order were reserved.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The record does not show it.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. They were reserved this morning.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But the action of the House was taken on the 28th day of February, and I claim that it is too late now to reserve the point of order upon what the House did a month ago.

Mr. THOMAS. In answer to the gentleman from Tennessee in regard to the point I was making, if the point he now insists upon has any ground whatever to sustain it, it is that the Committee on War Claims has no power to introduce a bill as an original measure into this House. Under that it seems to me the point of order can be made at any time, and before the Committee of the Whole as well as in the House.

Suppose, Mr. Chairman, that some gentleman not a member of this House, who has no authority or power to introduce a bill, had assumed to do so, and that by chance it should go upon the Calendar, and you, as the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, when this bill came before the House for consideration, should discover that it had been introduced without authority of law by a person having no right to introduce it, and that it had gotten upon the Calendar. Is it too much to assume that you would hold the point of order against the bill at any time when that discovery was made?

Would it do to say that there had been no point of order reserved? Would it do to say that, because some one who had no right to introduce a bill had done so and that because no notice had been taken of it before, it was then too late to interpose objection? Why, you could destroy in that manner the validity of any legislation whatever in Congress.

But the point to which I desire particularly to refer is as to the jurisdiction of the Committee on War Claims. Had it any right to introduce this omnibus bill? On that point it seems to me that the objection can come at any time, and must be entertained.

Now, I wish to state some facts, Mr. Chairman, upon which you can base a judgment as to whether the bill is rightly before the committee or not. The fact is, and will not be denied, I imagine, by any gentleman, that there are some one hundred and twenty of the cases embodied in this bill in regard to which there was no bill introduced in the House and referred to the Committee on War Claims out of which to draw the pending measure. There are in this bill some two hundred and eighty-five claims acted upon by the Court of Claims and reported back to this House. But, sir, I wish to state some facts in relation to the draughting of this bill, something that I do not understand or comprehend. The majority of the committee assume to authorize a member of the committee to prepare and introduce a bill; but, sir, I find by the report of the committee that one of the claims embodied in the bill was not certified to this House until March 1, 1890, and this bill was introduced on the 28th day of February, 1890. How could that possibly have happened?

Mr. ENLOE. I can tell the gentleman in a moment how it happened. It was an error of the clerk in making the compilation of the bills, and there has been the necessary action taken to correct it.

Mr. THOMAS. I can not imagine, Mr. Chairman, whose fault it was; but I find upon further examination of the bill that on March 12, 1890, cases were certified by the Court of Claims to the House, and they are embodied in the bill; and yet the bill itself was drawn on the 28th of February. How could the clerk make a mistake in that connection?

Mr. ENLOE. If the gentleman will allow—

Mr. THOMAS. I prefer that the gentleman would not interrupt me now. I say I do not understand how this could have been done. The case was not here; it was in the Court of Claims. Is it not a fact that the bill was drawn up without examining the files and records of the Committee on War Claims of the House of Representatives, but from other files or reports, of which I know nothing? I want to state the further fact, Mr. Chairman, if I were permitted to discuss the merits of the bill itself, that the bills or claims, many of them, embodied in this bill are not for the payment of loyal claimants; I care not whether the Court of Claims so certified or not. If I were permitted to enter upon a discussion of the merits of the case I could show proof of disloyalty taken from the archives of the Confederate States; and, besides this, many of these claimants, instead of proving their loyalty before the Court of Claims, fail utterly on that point.

Mr. HOUK. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOUK. As I understand it the question before this committee is a question of order, as to whether we have proper jurisdiction of this bill. Now, the gentleman is proceeding to discuss the merits of the individual claims it carries. I claim that is not in order, and want to notify the gentleman that when it comes properly before the House we are ready to meet him and discuss that question, and dispose of the evidence which he thinks he has dug up. We will be able to show that it is as false and unreliable as many of the other statements which have been made in regard to this bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of New Jersey. Is it not official?

Mr. HOUK. And I insist that the gentleman shall confine himself to the question of order which is to be decided.

Mr. THOMAS. I wonder the gentleman from Tennessee did not feel so much anxiety when the gentleman from Maryland was talking, when he spoke of these claimants as loyal men, and urged that this bill be considered because of the loyalty of the claimants, so found by the Court of Claims.

Mr. HOUK. The gentleman from Maryland never entered into the merits of the case.

Mr. THOMAS. He entered into it sufficiently to say that they were good loyal men.

Mr. HOUK. Well, I think so, too; but the gentleman is going beyond that point.

Mr. THOMAS. Only to dispute that statement and show that they were not loyal.

Mr. HOUK. But the question here is one of order; not whether these claims are just or not or whether the parties were loyal. It is perhaps the question of locality upon which the gentleman is so anxious.

Mr. THOMAS. The Committee on War Claims had no chance to ascertain whether the claims were just or not. They were never investigated when they came before that committee. They were bundled together and put in a bill by order of the majority of the committee; and I made a formal minority report, protesting against the passage of the bill. I allege that none of these claims were examined by or considered by the committee, but were taken and placed in this bill with as much disregard of the merits of any one of these cases as though the Bowman law made the decisions of the court final judgments, when in fact such decisions are only advisory.

And now, sir, upon that question I undertake to say that it would be a dangerous practice to permit a committee to gather together, without examination, claims, every one of which has been repudiated either by the Southern Claims Commission or by the Quartermaster-General's Office as absolutely having no merits, and in most of the cases declaring the claimants disloyal, and placing them in this bill simply because some court had received such information as enabled it to recommend the claims and certify as to the loyalty of the claimants. Why, sir, the bills the gentleman has referred to as the 4th of July bills have never taken such a course.

Mr. ENLOE. I ask the gentleman if he will permit me—

Mr. THOMAS. I decline to be interrupted. These 4th of July bills have all been introduced by members of this House—been presented as other bills are presented. They have been referred to a committee.

They have been examined there. They have been reported upon, and then acted upon by this House. This bill has never taken that course at all. Of course it is all wrong. There is no reason why this House should consider a bill which was never introduced in the House till this committee, without authority and without precedent, introduced it, and which has not received any consideration by a committee except a mere draughting of the bill. There is no rule requiring the House to take up for consideration a bill that was never introduced except by the committee, and which bill the committee to which it was referred has never considered.

The Court of Claims may have investigated these claims after a fashion. There is something remarkable, however, in the fact that notoriously disloyal people have been able to prove to that court their loyalty. It may be, sir, that the fault is with the attorneys of the Government, who have permitted the claimants to prove whatever they pleased, have permitted these disloyal people to prove their loyalty even in the face of the Confederate records, which prove beyond doubt the disloyalty of these people. Men who were in the Confederate army, and men who had sons in the Confederate army, and men who openly gave aid and comfort to the rebellion—these are the men who have, by some mysterious process, been allowed half a million dollars by that court.

Mr. ENLOE. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to be at least fair.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course I desire to be fair.

Mr. ENLOE. The gentleman has declined to be interrupted and has refused to permit a question, but proceeds to discuss the merits of the claims. I want to say that that is not fair treatment.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to say that I want to treat every member of the Committee on War Claims fairly; and I think what I have said is true: That the majority of the committee made up this bill and directed it to be reported to the House without examination of a single item to ascertain whether it was correct or not.

A MEMBER. They say so in their report.

Mr. THOMAS. They say so in their report.

Mr. ENLOE. Upon what item do you make that statement about the bill good?

Mr. THOMAS. What statement?

Mr. ENLOE. The statement that you made.

Mr. THOMAS. I say that there are cases in this bill that were reported from the Court of Claims on the 11th of March and which were not sent to the House before the 12th of that month; and this bill was prepared on the 28th of February, 1890.

Mr. ENLOE. I say that there was a subsequent meeting of the committee at which the gentleman was present, and they took up and authorized the report that embraces these new cases. The gentleman knows—

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, how can a bill be amended in the Committee on War Claims after that committee has reported it to the House? How can the gentleman say that this bill was amended in committee after it was reported to the House when these items are original items in the original bill?—a bill drawn containing findings of the court as late as the 12th of March which bill was reported to the House on the 28th of February before.

Mr. ENLOE. In answer to that I say that I am authorized by the committee to offer the amendments in this House.

Mr. THOMAS. But these findings of March 1 and 12 are in the original bill, and how did they get there? That is the question. [Laughter.] You may have afterwards got authority of the committee to put them there, but that was unnecessary, for they were already there—there before the Court of Claims had made their findings.

Mr. ENLOE. Does the gentleman insist that a committee having reported a bill to the House could not authorize any member after that bill had been reported to the House to offer amendments on the floor to perfect that bill, and especially a bill where there are numerous items, names, and amounts?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not deny that the full committee authorized you to make the motion in the House to amend the bill as to names and amounts when you had made mistakes in drawing it up, but in the draughting of the bill there are cases that even the Court of Claims had never certified to Congress.

Mr. ENLOE. Does the gentleman mean to say that when the committee directed the clerk to take all these cases relating to quartermasters' stores that have been reported favorably upon by the Court of Claims and embody them in the one bill, and he does not do it correctly, and there are mistakes on the part of the clerk—does he mean to say that for that reason it is not right to perfect the bill by bringing in amendments to correct the errors of the clerk?

Mr. BUCHANAN, of New Jersey. A nunc pro tunc proceeding.

Mr. THOMAS. This bill was drawn in such a manner that the amendments proposed are so many in the bill as to make it black with ink. There is hardly a single item in the whole bill that does not require the name or the amount corrected, and there are some added since the bill was reported, by whose authority I do not know.

But, sir, there are many items that I have found that show that not only has the committee failed to properly examine on their merits, but that the court has been misled into making rulings as to loyalty that I do not believe will stand the test of examination. I undertake to say that there are many cases in this bill which, if examined in the light of the real facts, would not receive the approval of any man. The committee, however, sir, refused to examine a single case.

Mr. ENLOE. The amendments authorized at a subsequent meeting of the committee cover the objections to which the gentleman is referring.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think so. The bill was then out of the hands of the committee and reported to the House. I say for this reason it ought not to be entertained here now. I have a motion here which I intend to make when the bill is reached for consideration: to re-refer the same back to the committee with instructions. But, sir, I consider it to be all wrong that this bill should have been, in the manner it was, reported to the House, and that it ought not to be entertained at all now, for I know of no precedent for this proceeding of the Committee on War Claims; and I aver that never before has this committee assumed to introduce a bill like this. All bills heretofore reported by that committee, so far as I am able to learn, have originated in the usual and ordinary way: been introduced into the House and referred to that committee, and then acted upon by this committee. I deny that the Committee on War Claims has the right to introduce bills into this House; there is no precedent or authority for it. The only right any committee has to introduce a bill into this House is in cases where the rules specially authorize it.

The Committee on War Claims is not one of those committees. This omnibus bill covers $538,419, I believe, of money to be taken out of the Treasury. It has been drawn up and brought before this House without any consideration by the Committee on War Claims. The wrong and disadvantage of that course is that not only the committee failed to give it any consideration, but the members of the House have not had their attention called to it by having it first presented to the House, published in the RECORD, printed, and copies distributed among the members in order that they might know what had been done; on the contrary, this bill for half a million dollars is launched upon the House by the committee without any investigation by the committee whatever as to the justice of the items contained therein; and, for one, I object to that manner of getting this bill before the House.

These claims were at an early day, just after the close of the war, on a fair investigation, rejected by the Southern Claims Commission or the Quartermaster-General's Department, mostly upon the proof of the disloyalty of the claimants; but now, sir, after twenty-five years has elapsed they are enabled to get a certificate of loyalty, whereby they seek to put their hands into the Treasury and withdraw millions of dollars. This is but the commencement, the first effort, an experiment. If it succeeds there will be vast amounts appropriated in the same way. For this reason, Mr. Chairman, I think you should most seriously examine the question now brought before you, the decision of which will involve the saving or expenditure of a vast sum of the people's money.

If a bill of this kind is to be considered at all, let it be considered in the Committee on War Claims, first having been introduced into the House in the regular way; let it be carefully considered by the committee, and if there are any disloyal claims in it, if there are any persons who, under false pretenses, have obtained the decision of the court in their favor, let them and their claims be eliminated from the bill.

It is unfair to those who were honest and who were Confederates that other men, who have no conscience, no honor, should seek to cover up their own disloyalty and, in violation of law, deceive the court, thereby securing for themselves certification of loyalty when the records of their own pretended government show, in many instances, that they were members of the Confederate army.

Mr. ENLOE. That question was thoroughly investigated by members of the committee. The gentleman [Mr. THOMAS] was invited to be present when we came to consider the merits of that question, and if he can establish the identity of a single one of these persons in the bill as of the character he now describes I will agree that his statement is correct. Otherwise I must hold that it is not correct.

Mr. THOMAS. I asked that privilege in the committee when the committee was in session; I asked the privilege in the full committee; I asked the privilege when I should not be surrounded by a crowd of attorneys; I asked the privilege to calmly, deliberately, and judiciously consider the facts, and the majority of the committee refused me the privilege. Afterwards they graciously invited me down amongst a herd of the attorneys in these cases who, I think, have gotten the cases through the Court of Claims in the manner I have stated. If these attorneys did not do that, then the court itself has been most negligent and wrong in some of its decisions, in my judgment. All I want is a fair and honest consideration of the items of this bill by a committee of this House, and then by the Committee of the Whole and by the House.

I have no desire that loyal men should be deprived of their rights; but, sir, I say if one Confederate is going to reap a reward in the way of payment for his property we ought, in justice, to give the same to every one of them, and I believe that every candid gentleman upon this floor who was upon the Confederate side feels as I do about this matter. Here are certain people, who were notoriously disloyal, mixing themselves up in an omnibus bill with those who were loyal and seeking to drag their claims through on the back of the loyal. Why should that be? That is what I object to and that is the reason I am so strenuous and anxious that this bill shall be considered upon its merits.

Mr. COLEMAN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLEMAN. I am trying to get posted upon this subject. Is there any question as to the loyalty or disloyalty of the Court of Claims? [Laughter.]

Mr. THOMAS. Well, sir, there may be a question as to the loyalty or disloyalty of some of the attorneys who acted for the Government in getting up the evidence.

Mr. ENLOE. Could a disloyal attorney go down there and corrupt a loyal court?

Mr. GROSVENOR. He could keep away witnesses.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of New Jersey. He could suppress testimony.

Mr. THOMAS. I will answer that by saying that in one case a local attorney was employed by the Government to get up testimony, and he and the attorney of the claimant met and drew up a deposition and the witness swore to it in the absence of the attesting officer, and it was then taken to that officer and his jurat was attached to it, and that deposition was sent to the Court of Claims and the court rendered a judgment of loyalty in the case, when at the same time the Confederate records showed that the man had been disloyal.

Mr. ENLOE. If the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. THOMAS] is going to make an attack upon the Court of Claims, either as to its loyalty or disloyalty or its integrity, we would like to have something to say upon that subject, and, so far as the attorney having charge of the defense for the Government is concerned, I asked him if he could point out any cases in this bill where there was reason to suppose that the findings of the court were not correct, and he pointed out two cases, and they were stricken out of the bill or will be.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, if he found two cases I want to see if there are not more. I know there are many more.

Mr. ENLOE. You can not find more.

Mr. THOMAS. The gentleman is mistaken; I have found a good many more.

Mr. ENLOE. I would like to see your evidence.

Mr. THOMAS. I found one case where the man's name was Wy-song. He is the man who got up the evidence in the way I have stated. Then there was another case where the name of the claimant was Kilmer.

Mr. ENLOE. Who was the attorney in that case?

Mr. THOMAS. I did not take the attorneys' names. I only took the facts. But, Mr. Chairman, I undertake to say that the Confederate records show that the claimants in these last-named cases were disloyal, and I am satisfied that there are many others.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order, and I must insist upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. HOUK. The gentleman from Wisconsin is not discussing the question which is before the committee, but is discussing the merits of the bill. If he is going to do that, let it be understood that we are now upon the merits of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Ohio. It looks to me as if we were talking about the demerits.

Mr. HOUK. Well, that depends upon how the gentleman looks at it. If there are demerits in the bill and if gentlemen will proceed in an orderly way and proper manner to dispose of the question of order, then, if the bill is taken up, each case can be considered separately, and I will promise now that I will vote for no claim where the proof does not sustain it.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is unfair, unjust, and improper to occupy a whole day in discussing the merits of a bill which is not before the House, under the pretense of discussing a question of order, and I ask a ruling of the Chair upon my point one way or the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already ruled that gentlemen must speak to the point of order, but at the same time the Chair can hardly mark the line wherein they shall walk.

Mr. HOUK. It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that even the dull-est perception ought to be able to see that the gentleman from Wisconsin has not been discussing the point for more than half an hour past. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair may agree with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK], but still it is not necessarily the duty of the Chair to call the gentleman to order; but when the gentleman from Tennessee calls attention to the point, then the Chair must take notice of it.

Mr. HOUK. In all seriousness, Mr. Chairman, I say it is unfair to this House and it is unfair to these claimants to occupy this day, the only day in the week that we have for the consideration of these private bills, in such a discussion as we have had here. It is a fraud upon the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. THOMAS. And the adoption of this bill would be a fraud on the country. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. THOMAS] will proceed in order.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I have not in my judgment transgressed any rule of order. What I have said in relation to the formation of this bill and the manner in which it was gotten up was in illustration, not only of the injustice, but of the illegality of bringing in this bill in the way in which it has been brought in from the Committee on Claims. Sir, if they had introduced this bill and had examined the matter as they would have been obliged, under other circumstances, to examine each case to see whether the claim was right as to amount and as to the question of loyalty, that would have been a different matter, and a different bill would now lie before us; but—

Mr. HOUK. Does the gentleman pretend to say that he, as chairman of the Committee on War Claims, has permitted a bill to come in here without any verification of its contents?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; and I made a minority report against it upon that very ground.

Mr. HOUK. Well, eleven of the gentleman's colleagues do not agree with him.

Mr. THOMAS. They admit in their report that they have never investigated an item of it, and if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] had not been so anxious that this bill should go through without investigation of its merits he would have learned, by an examination of the report, that the Committee on War Claims never investigated these items, and he would have been better informed as to the justice of this bill. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no feeling about this matter—

Mr. HOUK rose.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I have the floor.

Mr. HOUK. And you have had it for two hours. [Laughter.]

Mr. THOMAS. Not so long; but I have no doubt the time seems long to the gentleman.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. THOMAS] whether he is willing to yield for a motion that the committee do now rise.

Mr. THOMAS. If it is the desire of the committee to rise, I certainly do not want to occupy time now with my remarks.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. My suggestion is that the gentleman yield only for that purpose.

Mr. THOMAS. For that purpose I will yield.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The gentleman from Wisconsin yields the floor to me to move that the committee rise. I make that motion.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I presume I shall retain the right to the floor if the motion should be rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to yield the floor for the purpose of allowing another gentleman to make the motion that the committee rise, and on the resumption of the session of the committee the gentleman will have the floor. The gentleman from Kansas moves that the committee now rise.

Several members addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is not debatable.

Mr. COLEMAN. I rise to a question of information. I would like to be informed before the committee rises whether there exists any doubt concerning the loyalty of the other Republican—

The CHAIRMAN. That question can not be asked now. The motion that the committee rise is equivalent to a motion that the House adjourn, and is not debatable.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, there were—ayes 64, noes 89.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, and Mr. ENLOE were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 87.

So the Committee of the Whole refused to rise.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, as bearing upon this point of order I ask the Clerk to read the names of about forty claimants in behalf of whom no bill has been introduced in this House, but whose names are included in the present bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

W. Shiffer, no bill; A. Poffinberger, no bill; James S. Coleman, no bill; Elias Eakle, no bill; Ann E. Grous, administrator, no bill; Tilman Hilliary, no bill; F. M. and Josiah E. Doan, no bill; Samuel S. Gloyd, no bill; Fieher N. New-comer, no bill; Mary Siden-shiker, no bill; Robert and Dennis and Kilmore, no bill; Brusias Coman, administrator, no bill; William H. Borders, no bill; Elizabeth M. Johnston, no bill; R. W. Montgomery, administrator Benjamin C. Emery, no bill; Theodore S. Barksdale, no bill; A. T. Sauerfer, no bill; Thornton O. Windham, no bill; Charles W. Wood, no bill; Betty R. Reily, no bill; W. Owens, administrator, no bill; Edward Tearney, administrator, no bill; James C. Williamson, administrator, no bill; Frances A. Harnell, no bill; William Johnson, no bill; Jackson P. Lewis, no bill; J. M. Shivers, administrator, no bill; Jacob Friend, administrator, no bill; W. B. Green, administrator, no bill; Anna M. Anderson, et al., no bill; Joseph Grantham, no bill; John R. Reeves, administrator, no bill; John S. Leary, et al., no bill; Jacob H. Keedy, no bill; Malinda Rogers, administrator, no bill; Nesby J. Burrell, administrator, no bill; William Nuckles, no bill; W. C. Davidson, no bill; Ella Bryan, no bill; William G. Davis, no bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Now, Mr. Chairman, the names of those claimants, about forty in number, have been incorporated in this bill, although no bills for their relief have been introduced in this House. I am informed—and a hasty examination leads me to believe the information correct—that the claimants whose names have just been read constitute only one-fourth or certainly not more than one-third of the claimants in whose behalf no bills have been introduced here, although their claims are included in this bill. In my judgment the bill contains at least one hundred claims of this character—claims for the payment of which no bill has been introduced in this House.
